Had all the oppressions complained of here still continued under Charles, this remonstrance had been the bravest and wisest measure that any parliament ever pursued, and must have done immortal honour to its framers; but as all those grievances had been already redressed; as the land-marks of the constitution had now been refixed; as Charles had been as liberal in granting, as his subjects had been importunate in asking: all this, I say, being the case, what can any unprejudiced person imagine the true end of this remonstrance to be? The answer is obvious! No wonder, therefore, that an appeal of such an invidious and malignant nature, should meet with a strong opposition in the house of commons, where it passed by a majority of only eleven, viz. one hundred and fifty-nine against one hundred and forty-eight. Indeed it was easy to see that the road must now divide, and that the well and the ill intentioned could no longer journey together. The proceedings of the opposition were very distasteful to many of their own friends in the house, who began more and more to mistrust their intentions. Mr. Capel, member for Hertfordshire, a person of great integrity and authority in parliament, had been very warm in the opposition, and had been as forward as any gentleman in the house for removing the real grievances of his country: the like may be said of the lords Falkland and Digby, sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others, whose concurrence against the court had given vast credit to the opposition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and perhaps farther than in duty, they could require, and that opposition ought to cease. They made no secret of these sentiments, and Mr. Capel had been called up to the house of peers; treaties were likewise on foot with many other noblemen and gentlemen, who were quite wearied out by the incroachments of the faction, but none had yet the courage, the lord Digby excepted, to break with the faction in the house of commons. It is said that Oliver Cromwell, who was at this time a member of the house, declared, that if the remonstrance did not pass, he would sell the little estate he had, and retire from England. I take notice of this speech, only to prove that this extraordinary man was then an enthusiast for that liberty which his ambition afterwards trampled upon.

When this remonstrance was presented to Charles, he received it with some impatience, but with great politeness and civility. It is remarkable, that it was carried to the king by sir Ralph Hopton, who became afterwards so great a convert to his cause. But the faction thought they could not completely effect their ends, unless they could have the bishops out of the upper-house: they easily stirred up the populace to their purpose, who filled the whole city with sedition, and, assembling in great multitudes before the house of lords, exclaimed "No bishops! no bishops!" Twelve prelates,

“His majesty farther declared, that having, by his mediation, prevailed for a peace between the French king and his protestant subjects, and engaged his word that the protestants should observe the articles of agreement; nevertheless, the king of France, contrary to the said articles of agreement, blocked up their towns, garrisons, and forts, and had committed many spoils upon them, when they had done nothing in violation of the edict of peace. And that the king of France had committed an example of great injustice, in full peace to seize upon one hundred and twenty English ships, with all their merchandize and artillery: for which reasons, the king was resolved to send a powerful army and navy to require satisfaction.”

The command of the fleet was then given to the duke of Buckingham, by whose instigation the rupture with France had been resolved upon: however, in his commission, no mention was made of France, but that the expedition was intended for the relief and restoration of the king of Bohemia and his family; and that the fleet was to be employed as well by way of offence as defence, as should be most conducive to the service of the said prince; which plainly shews its true destination was to be a secret.

This fleet, consisting of above an hundred ships, having on board seven thousand soldiers, sailed from Portsmouth the seventh of June, 1627, and on the twentieth of July appeared before Rochelle. At the duke's approach, the Rochellers shut their gates, for fear of a surprize, as having no notice an English fleet was to come so near them. Presently after arrived the duke de Soubise, with Sir William Becher, who told them, from the duke of Buckingham, that the king of England, out of compassion to their sufferings, had sent a fleet and army to their assistance; and if they refused his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagements of honour and conscience for their relief. The mayor replied, in the name of the inhabitants, that they most humbly thanked his majesty for his care of them, but being in strict union with all the rest of the protestants in that kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered succours, without consulting their friends, and without the previous consent of the whole body of the Huguenots. The duke of Buckingham, finding by this answer it would be difficult to get his troops into Rochelle, directed his course to the island of Rhé, where Foiras commanded; who, at first, endeavoured to hinder the landing of the English troops; but, his forces being few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel of St. Martin's, which was in a good state of defence. Had the duke understood the art of war, he would, without losing a moment, have marched to the fort, and by that means prevented Foiras from getting his provisions; but he spent so much time in landing his men, and in preparing to march, that Foiras had leisure to get a large quantity of provisions and ammunition into the place. At last the duke marched to St. Martin's, and besieged it in form, but with very little success; for Foiras, being a man of more experience than his antagonist, found means to keep him employed in the siege till November; he then sent the king word he should be master of it in eight days. Mean while, the French king, who had not expected this invasion, ordered his troops to march with all expedition towards the sea, and came in person to hasten the relief of the island of Rhé. When every thing was ready, count Schomberg passed into the isle at the head of six or seven thousand men, without any opposition from the English fleet, and immediately marched to St. Martin's; the siege whereof the duke of Buckingham raised with precipitation, being vigorously pushed by the French to the sea-side; and it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked the remainder of his troops. Thus ended the expedition to the Isle of Rhé, in which it is said near five thousand men perished, and amongst the rest major-general Burroughs, the best officer in England.

The shameful miscarriage of this expedition contributed still farther to inflame the ill humour of the people. Their liberties they believed were destroyed, illegal taxes imposed, their commerce, which had suffered extremely by the Spaniards, was in a manner ruined by the French war; all these misfortunes were imputed to the obstinacy of Charles, in following the counsels of Buckingham; a man, who neither by his birth, age, services, or merit, appeared to have any title to that unbounded authority which he now possessed.

It will readily be imagined, that neither the king or the duke were desirous of convoking a parliament, while the tide of popular discontent ran so rapidly against them; but, totally unable to procure the means of executing the other military operations they had in view without a considerable aid of money, necessity compelled them to have recourse to that disagreeable expedient; and it was at length resolved that Buckingham should be the first person to propose in council the assembling a new parliament; as it was hoped that by this popular act he might be excused and pardoned former offences, and regain some part of his lost credit with the nation. His advice was followed; and the duke having acted his part, the parliament was summoned, by the unanimous resolution of the council, to meet on the seventeenth of March following. Immediately after, warrants were sent to all parts, to release the gentlemen who had been imprisoned for the affair of the loan-money; and the king had the mortification to see almost all of them, to the amount of twenty-seven, chosen to serve as representatives in the ensuing parliament. Writs of summons were also sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, who had been confined to his country-house for refusing to license Sibthorpe's sermons, and to Williams, bishop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, who was prisoner in the Tower for having opposed the court measures; and every thing was done that could be devised, to bring the great assembly of the nation together in good humour.

The two houses being met on the seventeenth of March, 1628, were addressed by Charles in a speech, in which he pathetically sets forth the necessities of the times, and requires the assistance of his parliament; but, with the same breath, he most impolitically uses the following expressions: “Every man must now do according to his conscience; wherefore if you (which God forbid) should not do your duties, in contributing what the state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means God hath put into my hands, to save that which the follies of particular men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as a threatening, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals, but as an admonition from him, who by nature and duty has most care of your preservation and prosperity."

When Charles had ended his speech, the lord-keeper began a long harangue upon the state of affairs in Europe, setting forth the dangerous power of the house of Austria, and the motives (which the reader has already seen in the declaration of war) of England's interposing between the French king and his protestant subjects. Having expatiated on those matters, he concludes his speech thus; "his majesty, as he has told you, hath chose this way of parliamentary supplies, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of his own gracious disposition, and to the desire and will of his people: if this be deferred, necessity, and the sword of the enemy, may make way to the other. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say, remember it."

These two speeches need no comment, since they plainly speak both the king's principles concerning the use of parliaments, and his intention in case he received not from the present parliament the satisfaction he expected; but, notwithstanding the provocation this great assembly received from this manner of treating it, the commons resolved to proceed with the utmost calmness and moderation, in redressing the grievances of the public, in restraining the exercise of arbitrary power, in fixing the limits of the royal prerogative, and in asserting the rights and privileges of the people.

But before they entered into debate, the two houses petitioned the king for a fast, which being over, the commons proceeded to business; when it soon appeared with what spirit they were met; for in settling the proper committees for the dispatch of business, great complaints were made concerning the influence of the deputy-lieutenants and some justices of the peace, particularly in Cornwall, in violating the freedom of elections by quartering soldiers, and other oppressions, upon electors who opposed the court: they then ordered all their members to lay before the house the names of the popish recusants within their several provinces of representation; and resolved to proceed upon the king's supply, but so as it should go hand in hand with the redress of grievances. The chief speakers upon this important debate were sir Francis Seymour, sir Thomas Wentworth (afterwards the famous earl of Strafford), sir Benjamin Rudyard, sir Edward Coke, Mr. Cromwell, sir Humphrey May, and Mr. secretary Cook; which two last were for postponing the redress of grievances, and immediately granting the supply. It would swell this work too much was I to insert all that was said on this great occasion; it will be sufficient to observe, that the speeches made by the gentlemen of the opposition are perhaps the finest extant in any language, and may be found in a collection intitled, "The Sovereign's Preservative and the Subjects Privilege," printed in 1657, to which Mr. Rushworth has been greatly obliged, and has copied from it great part of his Collection: it is from them that the English reader can collect the truest notion of the English constitution, and the noblest sentiments of liberty, both personal and political.

In the course of these debates, it was found that when sir John Hevingham, and some other gentlemen, imprisoned on the subject of the loan, brought their Habeas corpus, they were, notwithstanding, remanded back to prison, upon this principle, laid down by the attorney-general, that persons committed by the king and council, were never bailed till his majesty's pleasure was first known. This produced many long and warm debates upon the liberty of the subject; and on the third of April, the following resolution appears entered upon the Journals:

"First, Resolved upon question, that no freeman ought to be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king or the privy-council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint, be expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained: without one negative.

"Secondly, Resolved upon question, that the writ of Habeas corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, he praying the same: without one negative.

"Thirdly, Resolved upon question, that if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, no cause of commitment, detainer, or restraint, being expressed, for which, by law, he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same being returned upon a Habeas corpus granted for the same party, that the man ought to be delivered or bailed: without one negative.

Fourthly, Resolved upon question, that the ancient and undoubted right of every freeman is, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate, and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge, ought to be commanded or levied by the king, or any of his ministers, without common assent by act of parliament: agreed, nemine contradicente."

While these dispositions were making by the commons to defend their civil and personal liberties, they were equally zealous concerning religion, and both houses presented a petition to his majesty on the thirty-first of May, against recusants; who was pleased to return for answer, "That he recommended to them to think of a law against popery; and assures his parliament, that the lenity hitherto shewn to the English papists, was only with a view to procure suitable advantages to English protestants in popish countries, in which expectation he had been deceived; and promises, that unless he saw better fruits for the future, he would execute the laws against the papists to a greater degree of severity than was craved in that petition." This answer so pleased the commons, that they forthwith proceeded to the business of the supply; and in order to convince his majesty that they were sufficiently disposed to relieve his necessities, provided he would gratify them in their just demands, they voted him no less than five entire subsidies; whereof when secretary Cook informed the king, Charles asked him by how many voices it had been carried, "By one," replied the secretary; at which perceiving the king change countenance, "Sir, added he, your majesty hath herein the greater cause to rejoice, for the house was so unanimous as to make but one voice;" at which the king was exceedingly pleased; and charged the secretary to tell the house, in his name, "that he would deny them nothing of their liberties which any of his predecessors had granted."

The supply, however, thus voted, was not yet passed into a law; and the commons determined to employ the interval in providing some barrier to their rights and liberties: forced loans, benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, billeting soldiers, and martial law, which were the chief grievances the nation complained of, and against which a permanent remedy was to be provided by some act that was to receive the sanction of the whole legislature. On the fourth of April therefore, the commons resolved to desire a conference with the lords, concerning certain ancient and fundamental liberties of England; and four members, each of whom was to chuse two assistants, were appointed to manage the conference. The managers were sir Dudley Diggs, who chose for his assistants sir Benjamin Rudyard and Mr. Pym; Sir Edward Coke, who made choice of Mr. Rolles and Mr. Hackwill to assist him; Mr. Selden, whose assistants were Mr. Herbert and Mr. Whitby; and Mr. Littleton, who had with him Sir Robert Philips and Mr. Charles Jones. Thus the management of this conference, which may be said to be decisive of the laws and liberties of England, was committed to men of as much spirit and learning as ever the nation produced.

The king was no sooner informed of the intention of the commons than he employed every expedient in order to divert them from their purpose; and all the time the conference was depending, endeavoured to amuse them by repeated messages, begging them to leave off talking of grievances, and to proceed upon the supplies; promising, upon his royal word, that they should then receive all due satisfaction. It would tire the reader, should I repeat the particulars of all those messages which the commons received, with a seeming deference to the king's person, but with a manifest contempt of his menaces, and an invincible distrust of his promises. The peers, who, though during the whole of these violent struggles they assumed in the main a laudable impartiality, were yet, as is natural, somewhat prejudiced in favour of monarchy, began to apprehend that the commons would go too far in their projected reform, and therefore recommended to them to consider of his majesty's assurances, and depend upon them: this occasioned several debates, and many arguments were urged on both sides of the question; but sir Thomas Wentworth reconciled all parties, by saying, "That never house of commons, so far as concerned themselves, had greater confidence than the present in the goodness of their sovereign: but we are all ambitious, said he, that his majesty's goodness should descend to posterity, and we are accountable for a public trust. There hath been a public violation of the laws, by the king's ministers; and nothing can satisfy the nation, but a public reparation. Our desire to secure the subjects right by bill, will carry us no farther than what is contained in former laws, with some modest provision for instruction, performance, and execution." These sentiments were so agreeable to the whole house, that the secretary was desired to consider them as an answer to his message. And now the commons went upon two petitions for the king, one against billeting of soldiers, and the other, the famous Petition of Rights, which was the result of all the conferences they had held with the lords upon the point of personal liberty. As the subsidy-bill was not yet passed, Charles was greatly perplexed how to behave; but he was at last obliged to receive the petition concerning billeting of soldiers, which was drawn up in very strong and affecting terms, complaining of the miseries which the kingdom suffered by the subjects being obliged to lodge and maintain such numbers of dissolute fellows. Charles could not help expressing his discontent in pretty strong terms, upon their presenting this petition; and, instead of answering it, he exhorted them to proceed, without loss of time, upon the supplies. Their obstinacy increased in proportion to his impatience: they determined not to gratify the king till he had done them justice; and the Petition of Right being by this time finished, they sent it up to the lords for their perusal and concurrence. The upper-house, for reasons I have already given, desirous to abate the over-zeal of the commons, proposed the plan of a remonstrance more moderate, which they recommended to their consideration; but the lower-house was by no means satisfied with this plan, which they asserted would leave their liberties in a still more precarious situation than at present, and therefore absolutely rejected it; but not without giving the lords ample and satisfactory reasons for so doing: and all obstacles being finally removed, the Petition of Right passed the commons, and was sent up to the lords for their approbation, who immediately passed the same, without any material alteration. This petition, which may be called the second Great Charter of England, is of so great importance, and forms so essential a part of the English constitution, that we should deem ourselves inexcusable should we deny our readers the satisfaction of perusing it at full length, which they may do in the subjoined note*.

The

* This petition, as agreed to by both houses, stood as follows.

"I. Humbly shew unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted, by a statute made in the reign of king Edward I. commonly called "Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo," that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied by the king, or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and, by authority of parliament held in the twenty-fifth year of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that, from henceforth, no person should be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, because such loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land: and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none shall be charged with any charge or imposition called a benevolence, or by such like charge: by which the statutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament.

II. Yet, nevertheless, of late, divers commissions directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have

The petition was delivered on the twenty-eighth of May, and on the second of June the king gave the following answer: "The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the performance whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged, as of his prerogative." This answer proved very unsatisfactory to the parliament, for, on the seventh of June, after great debates in both houses, the lords desired a conference with the commons, and it was agreed that they should join together in a petition to his majesty, "for a clear and satisfactory answer to the Petition of Right, in full parliament." While these debates subsisted, another message came to the commons, acquainting them, that his majesty designed in a few days to put an end to the session, and pressing them not to enter on any new matter. This was occasioned by the commons vigorously prosecuting Dr. Manwaring, a favourite of the king's, whom they obliged to make an abject submission, and recant the detestable doctrines of absolute power and non-resistance, which he had preached up*: but more particularly by a motion made in the house by sir Edward Coke, for impeaching the duke of Buckingham as the author of many of those grievances under which the nation laboured. The commons, enraged at this message from the king, which they looked upon as prescribing to them their method of proceeding, immediately fell in with sir Edward's motion, and the matter was carried on so warmly, that a remonstrance was almost finished against the duke, when Charles, apprized of the storm that threatened his favourite, resolved, if possible, to divert it by gratifying their wishes with regard to the Petition of Right. Accordingly, on the seventh of June, he came to the house of peers, and have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty; and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance and give attendance before your privy-council, and in other places; and others of them have been, therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in several counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. And whereas also, by the statute called "The Great Charter of the Liberties of England," it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be out-lawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. And in the eight-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, that no man, of what estate or condition soever that he be, should be put out of his land or tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.

V. Nevertheless, against the tenour of the said statutes, and others the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided, divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned without any cause shewed: and when for their deliverance, they were brought before a justice, by your majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer, no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council, and yet, were returned back to their several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to law.

VI. And whereas of late, great companies of soldiers and mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn, against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. And whereas also, by authority of parliament, in the five-and-twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, that no man should be fore-judged of life or limb, against the form of the Great Charter and the law of the land; and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of this realm or by acts of parliament; and whereas no offender, of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under your majesty's great-seal, have issued forth, by which certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever, and by such summary course and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is used in armies in the time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to law martial.

VIII. By pretext whereof, some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death: when and where, if, by the laws and statutes of the land, they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. And also sundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused or forborn to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said officers were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid: which commissions, and all other of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

X. They, therefore, humbly pray your most excellent majesty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament: and that none be called to make an answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: and that no freeman, in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: and that your majesty would be pleased to remove the said soldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be so burthened in time to come: and that the aforesaid commissions, for proceeding by martial law, be revoked and annulled: and that, hereafter, no commissions, of like nature, may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid; lest, by colour of them, any of your majesty's subjects be destroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchise of the land.

XI. All which they must humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that, in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom. Stat. 4 Car. I. cap. xiv.

* Manwaring had preached a sermon, which appeared, upon enquiry, to have been printed by the special command of his majesty; and, when examined, it was found to contain doctrines destructive of all civil liberty. It was there affirmed, "that though property was commonly lodged in the hands of the subject; yet, upon any urgent necessity, all property was transferred to the king; that the sovereign might impose taxes without consent of parliament; and that the divine law enjoined compliance with every demand, however unjust, which the prince should think proper to make upon the people."

pronouncing the usual form of words, "Soit droit fait comme il est désiré—Let it be law, as desired," gave full sanction and authority to the petition.

This concession was received with loud acclamations and public rejoicings; and the commons could no longer delay the bill of subsidies, which was immediately passed; but their ill humour did not abate: though they had granted the king this aid, yet they still retained a pledge in their hands, which, they imagined, would ensure the success of all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had not yet been granted by parliament; and the commons had artfully concealed their intention of attacking that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been given to the Petition of Right, which they justly considered as of the utmost importance. They then boldly affirmed, that the levying tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament, was an evident violation of all the ancient privileges of the people; and they proposed to present a remonstrance to that purpose. They next resumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct, against whom they had conceived the most implacable hatred, and drew up a remonstrance of several late miscarriages in the government, in the conclusion whereof they asserted, "the exclusive power of the said duke, and the abuse of that power, to be the principal cause of all the evils and dangers therein maintained; and therefore they humbly submitted it to his majesty's wisdom, whether it can be safe for himself, or for his kingdom, that so great power, both by sea and land, as rests in him should be trusted in the hands of any one subject whatsoever."

On the seventeenth of June this address was presented to the king, with the bill of subsidies, at the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall, who received it with the most sensible chagrin, and afterwards gave the lower-house to understand, that he would shortly put an end to the session. The commons hereupon set about putting the finishing hand to the remonstrance against tonnage and poundage. Great was the indignation of Charles, when he heard of this remonstrance; and well knowing, by experience, what effects it would have, if completed by the commons and rejected by him, he resolved to cut the session short before it could be perfected: he therefore, on the twenty-second of June, while the remonstrance was reading in the lower house, suddenly came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons, prorogued the session to the twentieth of October. On this occasion he addressed himself to both houses in the following speech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It may seem strange that I come so suddenly to end this session, therefore, before I give my assent to the bills, I will tell you the cause (though I must avow I owe an account of my actions to none but God alone.) It is known to every one, that awhile ago the house of commons gave me a remonstrance; how acceptable every man may judge, and for the merit of it I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it. Now, since I am certainly informed that a second remonstrance is preparing for me, to take away my profit of tonnage and poundage (one of the chief mainte-nances of the crown), by alleging that I have given away my right thereof by my answer to your petition.

"This is so prejudicial to me, as I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant it, being willing not to receive any more remonstrances to which I must give an harsh answer.

"And since I see that even the house of commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your petition; lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The professions of both houses in the time of hammering this petition, was no ways to trench upon my prerogative, saying, they had neither intention nor power to hurt it.

"Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my subjects; yet, to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare, that those things which have been done, whereby men had cause to suspect the liberty of the subject to be trenched upon (which indeed was the true and first ground of their petition), shall not hereafter be drawn into example for prejudice, and in time to come (on the word of a king) you shall not have the like cause to complain.

"But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, never meant (I am sure) by me to grant. To conclude: I command you all that are here, to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true meaning of what I granted you in your petition; but especially you, my lords the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of the laws; for none of the houses of parliament, either joint or separate (what new doctrine soever may be raised), have any power either to make or declare a law without my consent."

The reader of himself will be apt enough to make reflections upon the infatuation which possessed both the king and commons in the latter part of this session. If, on one hand, Charles has been taxed with a design to render himself absolute, it must likewise be owned that the leaders in the parliament seemed bent upon infringing and reducing his undoubted prerogative. His confirmation of their rights and privileges was so well received in all parts of the kingdom, that the violent party began to fear the king would become popular; they therefore resolved, in drawing up the remonstrance, to insert in it every shadow or suspicion of a grievance, which might help to inspire the subject with an hatred and contempt of the sovereign. In short, I can by no means think the commons are to be justified in pressing their remonstrances before they saw some fresh invasion of their national liberty, or some fresh abuses of regal power, on which they could ground their proceedings. Possibly Charles, upon such forbearance of the commons, might have followed his too great propensity to arbitrary rule, and have given them cause of complaint; but I am inclined to believe, that had they forbore these remonstrances, they would then have left all the blame with Charles, nor would the public have been so much divided in their sentiments, as they afterwards were, to the deluging their country country with the blood of her own sons and the utter overthrow of the constitution.

Rochelle had been for some time besieged by the French; and it appeared, by cardinal Richelieu's taking the conduct of it upon himself, that he intended to exterminate the Huguenots, whose whole dependance lay now upon Charles. In May, this year, the presence of Buckingham being necessary in parliament, at the pressing instances of the duke of Soubise, and deputies sent from Rochelle, the earl of Denbigh was dispatched, with a fleet, to the relief of this place; but neglecting to attack the French fleet, had returned with dishonour. In order to wipe out this stain, the duke of Buckingham resolved to take the command upon himself, and repaired to Portsmouth, where the fleet and forces were rendezvoused: but before he could set out on his expedition, he met with that fate from the hand of an assassin, which, had he survived much longer, he would probably have suffered from the general resentment of the nation. This assassin was John Felton, a gentleman by birth, who had been a lieutenant of infantry, and disappointed in his expectation of a captain's commission, which Buckingham had bestowed upon another. This man was a fanatic in religion, and in this case his revenge seems to have co-operated with his enthusiasm. The duke was walking with sir Thomas Fryer, through an entry, from one apartment to another, when Felton, coming behind him, stabbed him with a knife, which he left sticking in the wound; Buckingham exclaimed, "The villain hath killed me!" and, pulling out the knife, dropped down and died on the floor. The assassin might have escaped; but seemed to glory in his crime, and surrendered himself immediately to justice.

Charles was at a gentleman's seat, within four miles of Portsmouth (whither he had come, by his presence to hasten the preparations) when his favourite was killed, and he received the news of it while he was at church; but he was so intent in his devotions, that no discomposure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance, till the service was over, when he threw himself on his bed, and poured forth a flood of tears, and the most passionate expressions, for the memory of his beloved Buckingham, whom he always cherished, and shewed his regard for, by a noble train of munificent acts towards his widow and family. When the first transports of grief were a little subsided, he sent Dr. Hutchenon, one of his chaplains in ordinary, to try if he could learn from the assassin by what inducement he had committed the horrid fact. Felton strenuously denied his having been dealt with by any one for that purpose, declaring his only motive to have been, that the duke had been declared an enemy to the common-wealth in the late remonstrances tendered to the king by the parliament; and this he persisted in, both at the time of his examination before the lords of the council and at his execution: that which excited this wretch to so horrid a murder, seems likewise to have influenced the people in general, who rejoiced at the death of the duke as of the greatest enemy of their country.

Thus in the flower of life, being but thirty-six years of age, fell George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, whose rise was sudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. Notwithstanding the load of public censure heaped upon this great favourite and minister, there appears good reasons to induce us to believe that he meant well to both his master and his country; and that his chief misfortunes proceeded from jealousy in others, who thought the great and extensive power he enjoyed dangerous to the rights of a free people. It is possible, if he had lived a few years longer, he might have seen through the temptations of greatness, and have proved as great a pillar of this state as any that ever went before him. He was of a most noble and generous disposition: he seldom studied to conceal his resentments, either of love or hatred; in the former he was immoderate, in the latter he was not sanguinary; but once offended, he never could forget: his courage was great, but it sometimes transported him too far, for if he had a little yielded to the times, and withdrawn from those storms he could neither prevent nor allay, he might perhaps have found a milder fate.

The fatal event of the duke's death, which happened on the twenty third of August, proved little or no obstacle to the proceedings of the fleet; the next day the command of the expedition was given to the earl of Lindsey; and they set sail from Portsmouth on the eighth of September; but by this time cardinal Richelieu had finished his famous Digue, or mote, which entirely blockaded Rochelle; and the English fleet being unable to force the barricadoe, or gain entrance into the harbour, were obliged to return without effecting any thing for the relief of the besieged, who, unable to hold out any longer, threw their gates open to the cardinal's army.

The ill humour this disgraceful expedition threw the nation into, made Charles think it improper to let the parliament meet according to their adjournment, in the month of October this year, and therefore he farther prorogued that assembly to the twentieth of January following; and in the mean time archbishop Abbot was admitted to kiss the king's hand, and commanded not to fail of his attendance at the council-table; which was done at this conjuncture to moderate the heats of certain ecclesiastics who made great disturbance in the church by their scholastical controversies concerning free-will, predestination, and the like. Both parties were countenanced by several bishops, and each of them would insist on their opinion being the true doctrine of the church, when in truth they were but the opinions of private men; for nothing can be called the doctrine of the church, that is not declared by the whole clergy lawfully assembled in convocation. These sectarists were distinguished by the names of Calvinists and Arminians: the Calvinists (which were the same with the Puritans) were countenanced by the commons in parliament and some few of the bishops; while the Arminians had the greater part of the episcopal order, and even the king himself, on their side, as they were zealous assertors of the prerogative royal and the court-doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. Charles, however, would gladly have put an end to these feuds, and reconciled both parties: with this view he caused the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England to be published, with a proclamation restraining all disputes on the points controverted: he also issued an order for calling in a book written by one Montagu, in the late king's time, called an Appeal to Cæsar, for which which he had been made a bishop. At the same time Dr. Potter, a known Calvinist, was promoted to the see of Carlisle.

Not all those acts of concession on the part of the court could, however, mollify the acrimony of the opposition; for the parliament assembling on the twentieth of January, 1629, the grand committees, which are usually the first things settled at the opening of that assembly, were very busy and active in traversing whatever views they thought the council might have adopted: that of religion made great complaints of invasions upon the church, which they pretended was much endangered by the growth of popery and Arminianism. They solicited the king to proclaim a fast, and presented an address, containing a sort of apology for their preferring the affairs of religion to any other article of business in their deliberations. Buckingham, the great object of their hatred, being now removed, their resentment glowed with a double rancour against Laud, bishop of London, who, as the king's spiritual director, encouraged all his high notions of hierarchy and prerogative. He was branded as a superstitious ecclesiastic, chief of the Arminian sect, by whose interest Montagu, Cozens, Sibthorp, and Manwaring, had been pardoned, and even promoted to bishoprics, or rich benefices; and they exclaimed against him as an implacable foe, not only to the puritans, but also to the liberty of his country.

While the committee was thus employed in examining religious grievances, the rest of the house were no less active in their inquiries into the miscarriages in civil affairs. Though the remonstrance against tonnage and poundage had not been presented to the king, it was, however, public, and sufficient to shew the people what was the sense of the house of commons. Upon this foundation, three merchants, among others, refused to pay this duty to the king; one of them, by name Rolles, a merchant of London and a member of the house of commons, had refused it, as contrary to law; whereupon his warehouse had been sealed up by the officers of the customs; and Chambers and Vassal, the other two merchants, were condemned by the barons of the Exchequer, who ordered their goods to be detained. The affair of Rolles was, by the commons, adjudged a breach of the privilege of their house, for which the custom-house officers were summoned before the house, to answer their misdemeanor therein. The king, willing to support his authority, interposed in this matter, and sent a message to the house, informing them, that what had been done by the officers, was only in obedience to the orders they had received: "that as to himself, he did not mean to levy these duties as belonging to him by hereditary right, but out of a full persuasion that the house of commons, suitable to their large professions, would grant them by bill, which he desired they would dispatch, to put an end to the dispute."

The commons, however, were far from being satisfied with this acknowledgement of the king; they still insisted, as an indispensable condition, that he should entirely forbear the levying of those duties; after which they would take into consideration upon what terms they would restore to him a revenue, which he had once fairly resigned. On this occasion debates in the house ran very high, and they resolved to proceed to a remonstrance against the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, "not being granted by act of parliament." Charles finding the commons thus refractory, immediately adjourned them to the twenty fifth of February, and afterwards to the second of March. When they met again, the same affair was brought upon the carpet; and so eager were they to vent their passion, that they locked the door of the house, and gave the key to sir Miles Hobart, one of their members, to keep, and refused to admit the usher of the black rod, whom the king had sent with a message to them; whereat he was so much offended, that he sent for the captain of the band of pensioners, and the guards, to force an entrance. In the mean time the heads of a remonstrance were offered to sir John Finch, the speaker, to be put to the question, which he refused, declaring that the king had given him an order to adjourn the house to the tenth of March, and to put no question, nor admit of any debate; upon which he rose and left the chair. The whole house was now in an uproar; the speaker was forced back into the chair, and held in it by Mr. Denzil Holles, and sir Peter Hayman, till the following protestation was drawn up and read.

"Protestation of the House of Commons.

"I. Whosoever shall bring in an innovation of religion, or by favour seek to introduce popery, or Arminianism, or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

"II. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying, of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall likewise be reputed a common enemy to the commonwealth.

"III. If any man shall voluntarily yield to pay the said subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, shall be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to this commonwealth."

This being passed in a tumultuous manner, they rose before the pensioners and guards came, and the house was adjourned to the tenth of March. In the intermediate time a proclamation was drawn, but not published, for the dissolution of the parliament, and on the third of March, Denzil Holles, esq. sir Miles Hobart, sir John Elliot, sir Peter Hayman, John Seldon, esq. William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroude, and Benjamin Valentine, were ordered next day to appear before the council. These gentlemen had distinguished their zeal through the whole session, but more particularly on the last day: and Mr. Holles, sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, and Mr. Valentine, attended the council, but refusing to answer out of parliament, which was still sitting, they were committed close prisoners to the Tower. Warrants were then issued for apprehending the rest, and for sealing up their studies.

On the tenth of March the king came in his robes to the house of lords, who attended in theirs; and made a speech, in which he twice called the gentlemen in the opposition "vipers," and commended his own party, and the house of in particular for their dutiful demeanor; and then dissolved the parliament.

These

These are all the proceedings of this famous parliament, that are worthy either of praise or imitation. Their heats concerning religion, their protestations relating to it, and their bitterness against all who were suspected of what they termed Arminianism, were as unjustifiable and undutiful, as the noble stand they made for the personal liberties and properties of the subject, was memorable and glorious. However, Charles, that he might not seem to exert a despotic power of punishing those who headed the opposition against his measures, and to persuade the people that he intended to conform himself to the law as much as possible, appointed the judges to assemble, on the twenty-first of April, at Serjeant's Inn, where he caused certain questions to be proposed to them; and, according to their answers, ordered the attorney general to raise a process against the imprisoned members, for their violent, unlawful, and seditious behaviour in the house of commons. Alderman Chambers was prosecuted in the Star-chamber, for having said "that the merchants were more oppressed in England than in Turkey," and was condemned to an exorbitant fine, the payment of which reduced him to extreme poverty. Long was sentenced to pay two thousand pounds for having violated his oath in sitting as a member of the lower-house, after he had been sworn sheriff of Wiltshire. The imprisoned members demanded the privilege of the Habeas corpus; they were detained in confinement from March to October; and then the court of King's Bench decreed, that they should remain in prison during the king's pleasure: Elliot was moreover cast in a fine of two thousand pounds; Valentine in one of five hundred; and Holles obliged to pay one thousand marks.

Charles, deprived of all hopes of supply from parliament, was now obliged to conclude a peace with the two crowns against whom he had hitherto carried on a war, begun without necessity, and conducted without glory. The crown of France, though victorious over its protestant subjects, was weakened by civil dissensions among the princes of the blood: it was threatened by the greatness of the house of Austria, and upon the point of being engaged in a war with Italy; in short, Lewis wanted a peace as much or more than Charles did; and it was privately agreed, that the Venetians should interpose their good offices for a peace between the two crowns. Georgi and Castarini, the two ministers employed by the republic for that purpose, had therefore very little more to settle than mere matters of form in their negotiation. At last, on the fourteenth of April, the articles were agreed on; but contain nothing in them remarkable enough to claim a place here. In Charles's present circumstances, he could not pretend to insist on any terms for the Huguenots; and they were accordingly left to the mercy of their sovereign.

Peace was soon after made with Spain. It is said that Reubens, the famous Flemish painter, who was then in England, painting a kind of apotheosis of James, for the roof of the noble banqueting-house of Whitehall, was ordered by the archduchess to sound the inclinations of Charles.

This is by no means unlikely. The war, which about two years before had broke out in Italy on account of the successions to the duchies of Mantua and Montferrat, had been unfavourable to the Spaniards; and that court, suspecting they should be deserted by the emperor, and being assured of the dispositions of Charles for peace, gave a public character to don Carlos de Colomos, for putting an end to the negotiations which Reubens had begun. It required very little dexterity to conclude this peace; the articles of which only confirmed the former treaties we have already seen, and was sworn to on the seventeenth of December, sir Francis Cottington being sent to Spain to take that sharp oath and ratification of the same.

In this peace nothing was stipulated in favour of the prince Palatine, except that Philip III. promised in general to employ his good offices for the restoration of the elector. Charles, however, did not desist from his endeavours to procure some relief to that unhappy family; he had a great affection for his sister, and had supported her husband and her in a court at the Hague, at a vast expence; and had expended large sums, as subsidies, in her service. Having settled his plan of governing without a parliament, he now imagined it would be in his power to give them effectual assistance. With this view, in the Spring of the year 1630*, in conjunction with France, he brought about a peace between the kings of Sweden and Poland, in hopes of inducing the former to undertake the cause of the protestants in Germany.

This was the famous Gustavus Adolphus, whose heroic genius, assisted by the wisest policy, rendered him, in a little time, the most celebrated monarch of the age. To encourage and support him in his intended invasion of Germany, Charles engaged to furnish him with six thousand men; but, that he might save appearances with the house of Austria, he employed the name of the marquis of Hamilton, a nobleman allied to the crown. Hamilton entered into an agreement with Gustavus; and, having levied these troops in England and Scotland, at Charles's expence, he landed them in the Elbe.

Soon after was fought the important battle of Leipzig; where the Imperial army, under count Tilly, was totally defeated by the victorious Swede. Gustavus proceeded in his conquests with such an amazing and rapid progress, as is scarce to be paralleled either in ancient or modern history; and, in a short time, made himself master of the greatest part of Germany.

Charles was all this while studying the means of raising money, and establishing his own power by making examples of those who durst oppose it. Among other methods practised by Charles to raise money, was that of appointing commissioners to compound with those who, though summoned at his coronation to come and receive the honour of knighthood, had neglected to appear. In the reign of Edward II. an old custom was enacted into a law, importing, that every man possessed of twenty pounds a year in land, should be knighted: almost all the succeeding monarchs had put this law in execution. Charles, considering the difference of value in money between that reign and the present time, summoned those only whose yearly rent amounted to forty pounds; yet, even this mitigation was deemed a hardship, because the value of twenty pounds in the days of Edward, was equal to four times that sum in the reign of Charles: a great number had therefore refused to obey the mandate, and these were now fined for their disobedience. A considerable sum was likewise exacted, by way of composition, from those who declined the order.

If these proceedings caused great discontents and murmurings among the people, they were not a little increased by Charles's giving orders for tonnage and poundage to be levied with great rigour. The custom-house officers were empowered to enter houses, and break open warehouses, chests, and closets, to search for goods which had not paid the duty: and, on this pretence of searching, they committed numberless acts of fraud and oppression. In order to prevent the popular clamours from producing insurrections, the council issued orders for arming and reviewing the militia, that the people might be intimidated by their appearance; while, on the other hand, they were amused with public orders for putting the laws in execution against papists. At the same time, the king endeavoured to fill his coffers by granting exclusive privileges for the sale of commodities and provisions; so that the whole kingdom was filled with monopolies, to the unspeakable prejudice of trade and manufactures. Presbyterianism having made great progress in England, the king, by the advice of bishop Laud, sent instructions to the prelates of the kingdom, enjoining them, among other things, to take especial care that no puritan minister should be admitted into the church; and to discover all such as should neglect the rites prescribed by the canons. The presbyterians conceived the most implacable hatred against Laud, for this, and other instances of his enmity; and he severely felt their resentment in the sequel.

In the spring of the year 1631, Mervin Touchet, lord Audley in England, and earl of Castlehaven in Ireland, was tried before his peers, for rapes and practices upon the body of his wife, which he partly forced and partly invited others to commit; which out-did the most shocking ideas of lust and infamous contrivance; and was found guilty. He was a nobleman descended from the illustrious lord Audley, the friend and companion in all his wars to Edward III. He had been ingenious enough to debauch the mind, as well as prostitute the body, of his lady; for, after his execution, she was pardoned for adultery, in terms not very advantageous to her virtue. On this occasion, Charles shewed a seasonable piece of justice, as he would grant no other favour to the criminal, than to change his punishment from hanging into beheading. But neither this exhibition of impartiality, nor the great zeal which Charles discovered in repairing and rebuilding the cathedral church of St. Paul (which had been lately burnt down), atoned, with men of sense and property, for his other impolitical and unpopular measures. Laud was so much in favour with him, that he acted as if his head had been turned, by introducing into religious worship many popish fopperies: for the particulars of which the reader may consult the common collections and histories of the times.

In giving an account of the third parliament held in this reign, we have often mentioned sir Thomas Wentworth, knight of the shire for the county of York: this gentleman several times, in the house of commons, gave proof of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privilege of parliament. By this means he became formidable to the court; though he took care not to run into any excess with regard to the king and his minister; on the contrary, he always softened his opinion with some honourable and respectful expressions, though he seldom failed to oppose the pretensions of the court. As he was one of the greatest geniuses then in England, the king soon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very serviceable to him, if he could gain him to his interest; he endeavoured it, therefore, after, or perhaps before, the dissolution of the parliament, and succeeded so well, that Wentworth became one of the most zealous promoters of the royal authority. About the same time also were gained sir John Saville, who was made a lord, and comptroller of the household; sir Dudley Diggs, who was promoted to the mastership of the Rolls, and was also made attorney-general; and sir Edward Littleton, who was made solicitor. Sir John Elliot, some time before his death, was tampered with, but he was proof against the temptation.

As sir Thomas Wentworth, since his conversion, had shewed himself a zealous defender of the prerogatives of the crown, the king thought him the fittest person to be trusted with the presidency of the council in the North; a court of judicature established at York in the reign of Henry VIII. for the relief of poor suitors in the counties of York, Cumberland, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and the bishopric of Durham, who could not afford to bring their causes into the courts of Westminster. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles ventured, at this time, to enlarge its powers, and to invest it with a kind of civil jurisdiction, which, in some respects, was even unparliamentary. In consequence of this illegal measure, all the northern counties were deprived of the protection of the common-law, and subjected to an authority which was wholly arbitrary.

It was now the year 1632, in which the great Gustavus, continuing his victorious projects through Germany, at last brought the elector Palatine to Munich. This unfortunate prince now saw himself on the point of being restored to his palatinate, and even to the crown of Bohemia, by the hand of the conqueror; when, in the second battle near Leipzig, fought in the plains of Lutzen, on November the sixth, this year, Gustavus was slain in the midst of a victory he had already gained.

His death proved fatal to the palatine Frederic, who now despairing of any farther resource, fell into a fever, occasioned by his immoderate grief, which, in a few months, put a period to a life of continual crosses and disappointments. This year Wentworth was created viscount Wentworth, and sent over lord-lieutenant of Ireland; where affairs were still in great disorder, through the insolence of the Roman catholics, who greatly abused the royal clemency in relaxing certain penal statutes against them.

The king having now governed the nation three or four years without a parliament, began to find himself more at ease than he had ever been since his accession to the throne; and therefore chose this season of tranquility to visit his ancient kingdom of Scotland: he accordingly set out for that kingdom in the month of May, 1633, where he was received with great magnificence; and the Scottish parliament, assembled at Edinburgh, granted a larger subsidy than ever had been given to any other king of that realm. Charles inherited his father's design, of bringing religion in Scotland to a conformity with the English church; and bishop Laud accompanied him in his journey, to facilitate the execution of his scheme. As a preparatory step, he passed two acts in the Scottish parliament, the first intituled, "An act concerning the king's prerogative, and the habit of the clergy:" this was no other than the confirmation of a statute enacted in the preceding reign, empowering the king to give such directions as he should think proper, with regard to the dress of the clergy. The other ratified and improved all the statutes which had been made concerning the liberties and franchises of the true church of God, and of the religion at present professed in the kingdom. Both these acts met with opposition from the presbyterians; they looked upon the first as a prelude to the use of the surplice, which was an abomination to their eyes; and the words "at present professed," they considered as an equivocal expression, calculated to restore episcopal government. Their church was governed by provincial synods and general assemblies; but the bishops still subsisted, though without the least jurisdiction or influence. The bills were passed, but they produced heats and discontent in the nation.

The Scottish religionists were not mistaken in their conjectures; the king's purpose was really to introduce the rites of the English church, and re-establish episcopacy in its former power and splendor. Bishop Laud preached, in the royal chapel at Edinburgh, on the benefit of conformity, and the reverend ceremonies of the church. He proposed to the Scottish bishops, that the English liturgy should be received into their service. They objected to this proposal, that such a step would alarm the jealousy of the nation, which would be apt to look upon the English liturgy as the forerunner of English laws, and an encroachment upon the independency of the kingdom: they therefore desired that another might be composed for the use of the Scottish church, that should be the same in substance, but different in some immaterial particulars. The king embraced this advice, though contrary to the inclination of Laud: he was himself jealous of the independency of his native kingdom, and appointed a select number of the Scottish bishops to form a new liturgy for their own service. He erected Edinburgh into a bishopric, created the archbishop of St. Andrew's chancellor of the kingdom, and he admitted several other prelates to seats in the privy council, and in the college of justice; a very unseasonable mark of his regard for the hierarchy; for the bishops, by this promotion, incurred the hatred and envy of the noblemen, who, though they respected them in their ecclesiastical capacities, could not bear to see them in civil stations, to which they thought themselves better entitled.

Charles returning to England in the autumn of this year, bestowed the dignity of archbishop of Canterbury (vacant by the death of Abbot in his absence) on his favourite Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to support ecclesiastical discipline with great rigor: and to inflame the general discontent of the nation, the Book of Sports to be used on Sundays after evening prayers, was again ordered to be read in churches; and many ministers, for refusing to read it, were either suspended, deprived, or prosecuted, before the high-commission. The articles of visitation published by Neale, bishop of Winchester, one of Laud's party, were no other than so many traps, contrived for bringing all whom Laud hated into the ecclesiastical den, where they seldom met with mercy. Writers in prose and verse, in polemics and politics, were treated with the like severity; of which the reader will find particular instances in the collections of those days.

There is little more to add to the transactions of this languid year, unless it were to swell the work with proclamations, which now supplied the place of acts of parliament. As to the concerns of Charles's family, he had this year sent the earl of Ormond with a generous invitation for the queen of Bohemia and her family to come into England; but the loss that princess had sustained by the death of her husband, was too recent for her sorrows to suffer her to accept of the invitation for that time. It must not be forgotten, that on the thirteenth of October, this year, the second son of Charles, afterwards the unhappy James II. was born.

We shall begin the year 1634 with an account of a cause which came to a solemn hearing in the month of February, which made a great noise, and which shewed the extreme severity of the court against such as were thought to fail ever so little in the submission expected from them; the case was this: Mr. William Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, had composed a large quarto, of a thousand pages, which he entitled Histrio Mastix. Its professed design was to decry tragedies, comedies, interludes, music, and dancing; but the author had likewise directed his satire against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bonfires, and May poles.

He had obtained a licence from archbishop Abbot's chaplain, for printing this book; yet he was indicted in the Star-chamber as a libeller. It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays, should be construed into satires against the king and queen, merely because they frequented these amusements, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastorals and interludes, which were represented at court.

The author, indeed, had taken occasion, in the most violent manner, to condemn the hierarchy, the ceremonies, the innovations in religious worship, and the superstitions introduced by Laud. In the course of his work, he gave such evident specimens of his fanaticism, or rather, indeed, of his frenzy, that his most proper punishment would have been to have sent him to Bedlam; but he was condemned to be put from the bar; to stand on the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay a fine of five thousand pounds to the king; and to be imprisoned during life.

The Dutch were at this time improving, equally with the English, in matters of commerce; and they were plainly rivals to one another in trade: flushed with success, the Hollanders, about this time, flatly asserted a right to fish on the British coasts, founded upon immemorial possession. Charles, shocked at the independent airs of that haughty republic, which had been nursed by the blood, and fed by the bounty, of England; and glad of a just and popular pretext for humbling her, resolved to fit out a fleet which should drive her subjects out of the Narrow seas. But the vigorous preparations necessary for this undertaking required to be supplied by a proportionable income, which Charles was by no means master of; he therefore referred it to Mr. Noy, attorney-general, to find out the ways and means; and Noy fell upon an expedient for raising an extraordinary supply, without the assistance of a parliament; which was, by the imposition of a tax upon the people, for furnishing a certain number of ships, for the defence of the seas. Noy died before the effects of his projects were known, after having engaged his master in an affair, which made him lose his people's confidence, and was one of the principal causes of his ruin.

The death of the attorney-general did not, however, hinder the king from putting his scheme in practice: to that end, writs were issued in October, this year, to all the port-towns and maritime counties of the kingdom, to furnish a certain number of ships, manned, victualled, and furnished with all necessary ammunition, for the defence of the realm. With these writs went instructions and directions, from the lords of the council, for the assessing and levying the ship-money. These instructions were directed to the sheriffs of the several counties; and by them it appears, that the ships assessed on the counties of Middlesex and Hertford were to cost three thousand pounds; and those who refused payment of their portion, were to be distressed, and their goods sold for the payment; and this without any respect of persons. The rest of those instructions contain only the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being served on the lord-mayor of London, he immediately called a common-council, who voted the following petition to be presented to the king.

“ To the king's most excellent majesty,

“ The humble petition of your faithful subjects, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of your city of London, most humbly shewing,

“ That whereas your writ, bearing teste 20 Octobris last, commanded your petitioners, at their charge, to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victuals, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth the first of March next, and continue thence by the space of twenty-six weeks in your majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas, and other causes in the said writ mentioned.

“ Your petitioners do, in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgments of your sacred majesty's favours unto our said city, inform your majesty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliaments (which they are ready humbly to shew forth) they are exempt, and used to be freed from that charge.

“ And do most humbly pray,

“ That your majesty would be graciously pleased, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the same privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing the said ships and provisions.

Notwithstanding the opposition of the city of London, Charles went on as if ship-money had been a matter of course, and not likely to give any disgust; and, his necessities increasing, he resolved that this tax should be extended to the inland, as well as the maritime, counties; but so great was the dislike that the nation shewed to this measure, which they thought to be against law, and a direct contradiction, on the part of Charles, of the Petition of Right he had granted in their favour, that the court thought itself under a necessity to quiet the people, by the use made of the money; for, in May of the following year, 1635, a fleet of forty sail was fitted out, under the command of the earl of Lindsey, admiral; sir William Monson, vice-admiral; sir John Pennington, rear admiral; and a Squadron of twenty ships was fitted out, under the earl of Essex. The admiral's instructions were to secure the Narrow seas, and the trade of England; and, on the twenty-sixth of May, the fleet set sail, in quest of the French and Dutch fleets, who were joined off Portland, as if they would have fought the English fleets: but Richelieu was too well informed by his spies, not to know that the real design of Charles was to drive the confederates out of the Narrow seas, and to destroy the growing marine of France, whom he considered as the prompter of the Dutch in all their insolencies: he looked upon the preservation of the sea-ports in Flanders to the crown of Spain, as being now of importance to his own crown; and his people likewise began to be extremely uneasy at Richelieu's ambition. The united fleets, at the approach of that of England, withdrew towards their own harbours; and the English admiral sent after them a bark, on the coast of Brittany, to observe their motions; which were all this year so pacific, that the English remained undisputed masters of the Narrow seas, to the infinite benefit of the nation. For the court of Spain reverted now to its natural connexions with England, who this year had, in all probability, saved the Austrian Netherlands from being over-run; and the immense benefits which the commons of England received by this friendship with Spain, would, if any thing could, have made the people overlook the proceedings of the court in the case of ship-money.

The king finding some inconvenience in the management of his treasury by commissions, which he had appointed on the death of the lord treasurer Weston, earl of Portland, last year, gave the office to Juxton, bishop of London, a creature of Laud's, who had persuaded the king, that he could not make a better choice than of that churchman, who having no family to raise, nor dependants to provide for, might better manage the income of the treasury to his advantage than had formerly been done by those who sought only to create vast estates to themselves. We shall conclude the transactions of this year, with observing, that Laud attempted to bring all the foreigners settled settled in England to a conformity with her church, notwithstanding all the privileges and indulgences they had received from former princes, and the infinite benefit the nation acquired by their settling here. This attempt was vigorously opposed by the French and Dutch churches, who were joined by all the puritans; and they refused to pay any deference to Laud's authority, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown. After many debates, Laud prevailed so far, that though the foreigners of the first descent were suffered to continue in their own way, yet, their descendants, born in England, of foreign parents, were ordered by the king, to repair to their several parish churches, under the penalty of being proceeded against by the ecclesiastical laws. In like manner, Laud endeavoured to oblige the factories abroad to conform themselves to the worship and exercise of the English church; but many of the merchants neglecting such conformity, he obtained the king's orders for it.

I shall only add, that Charles, prince elector Palatine, son of the deceased king of Bohemia, came this year into England, to visit his uncle, and to consult with him concerning his restitution to the Palatinate; and shortly after him arrived his brother, prince Rupert, whom, in the course of a few years, we shall find making a considerable figure, in the defence of Charles, against his rebellious subjects.

The great figure which Charles had made upon the seas in the year 1635, raised his hopes to a great pitch; and nothing could have defamed him, but his having made ship-money a tax assessable upon the inland, as well as the maritime, counties, and enjoined the collectors to levy it in the same manner, and with the same rigor, as if it had been a tax imposed by parliament: however, this expedient had, for the present, so far succeeded, that, in the spring of the year 1636, he was enabled to send to sea a fleet of sixty sail of large ships, which was the greatest naval force that England had ever seen of her own; the command of this fleet was given to Algernoon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who, for the great attachment of his ancestors to the Stuart family, was, by Charles, created lord high-admiral of England. The earl, setting sail in May, came up with some of the Dutch ships, and sunk all he met who refused to leave the British coasts, and to discontinue their fishing. This spirited conduct struck such a terror into all Europe, that even the haughty Richelieu was obliged to drop his scheme of setting the Dutch and French up as rivals to the English upon the sea. The Dutch themselves applied to Charles in the most earnest manner; and, at last, consented to pay thirty thousand pounds for licence to fish that year, until a proper regulation should be made, by fixing an annual tribute for the like licence for the future.

But no advantages of commerce, reputation, or tranquility, could now make the people digest the odious tax of ship-money. Charles finding that doubts, difficulties, and dangers, multiplied every day, and was at length become so general, that there was an evident disposition in the nation, rather to submit to the insults of foreigners, than to chastize them at the expence of law and liberty; he endeavoured to remove all manner of objections, by getting the decision of the judges on his side; he therefore sent the case to be resolved by them, which he thus stated:

“ Carolus Rex.

“ Where the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great-seal of England, command all the subjects of our kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number of ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such a time as we shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom, from such danger and peril, and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness; and whether, in such a case, the king is not the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?”

To which they returned the following opinion.

“ May it please your most excellent majesty.

“ We have, according to your majesty's command, every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration the case and question signified by your majesty, and inclosed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the kingdom is in danger, your majesty may, by writ under the great-seal of England, command all your subjects of this your kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such a time that your majesty shall think fit, for the trafic, defence, and safeguard of this kingdom from such danger and peril; and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness; and we are all of opinion, that in such case, your majesty is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.

This decision Charles took especial care to have published and circulated through the kingdom. Notwithstanding this opinion, one Mr. Hampden, being taxed in twenty shillings, for an estate he had in Buckinghamshire, resolved to stand suit rather than comply with an imposition so contrary to the laws of the realm and the liberties of the subject. The cause was pleaded in the court of Exchequer, before all the judges, with great solemnity; and was, undoubtedly, the most important dispute that ever was handled in any court of justice; for the business was to ascertain or destroy one of the most valuable privileges of the subject; as such it was considered by every sensible individual of the nation; it became the universal topic of conversation, and people expected the issue with the most anxious impatience. After several hearings, protracted from November till June, the judges decreed that Mr. Hampden should pay the tax; and the whole kingdom was filled with indignation. Burton, a divine, and Bastwick, a physician, were condemned by the Star-chamber to the same punishment which Prynne had undergone, for having published seditious and schismatical libels: and Prynne himself, for a second offence, was sentenced to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and lose the mutilated remainder of his ears*.

While the interesting affair of Mr. Hampden and ship-money was depending, the public uneasiness was farther encreased by a torrent of divisions in the church of Scotland.

Charles resolved to perfect his designs with respect to religion as well as the state; episcopacy had not been abolished in Scotland at the time of the reformation before Mary Stuart, but the protestant bishops had always been kept in subjection by the presbyterians. The Scots were governed by a kind of republic of priests, who were all upon an equality with one another: this was the only country, perhaps, in the world, where riches and honours did not make the higher clergy powerful. The bishops retained their seats in parliament, their honorary rights, and the revenues of their sees; but they were pastors without flocks, and peers without credit. The Scottish parliament, which was wholly composed of presbyterians, only suffered the bishops to retain their dignity, in order to debase them. The ancient abbeys were all in the hands of seculars, who had seats in parliament in virtue of the title of abbot. By degrees, the number of these titular abbots was diminished. James I. (and VIth of Scotland), restored episcopacy, with all its privileges. The king of England was not acknowledged as head of the church of Scotland; but being born in that country, and having lavished English money in pensions and places to several of its members, he was more master at Edinburgh than at London. The presbyterian (or, as it is called, the general) assembly, still subsisted as before, notwithstanding the restoration of episcopacy; these two different bodies were always threatening each other; and the synodic republic generally got the better of the episcopal hierarchy. James, who looked upon the bishops as a body devoted to the crown, and the presbyterians as enemies to the regal prerogative, thought that he should be able to reconcile his Scottish subjects to episcopal government, by bringing their church to a perfect conformity with the English. With this view he had, in the year 1616, obtained an act of the general assembly, for the compiling a liturgy, or book of common-prayer, which was to be first presented to the king, and, after his approbation, universally received through the kingdom. This book was accordingly framed, and sent up to the king; who having perused and considerably altered it, in conjunction with his English clergy, it was returned to Scotland, to be recommended to the use of that church. His death prevented the accomplishment of his design, which his son resumed; and in order to effect this purpose with greater ease, he endeavoured to encrease the authority of the prelates, and had even made an attempt to revive the first institution of the college of justice, that divided equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority.

The liturgy which Charles, of his own authority, intended to introduce into Scotland, was copied from that of England; but, not to shock the pride of his ancient subjects by a servile imitation of their southern neighbours, he caused a few alterations to be made in it, by the assistance of archbishop Laud and others, and in that form transmitted it to the bishop of Edinburgh, with orders to begin the use of it. Easter-day, 1637, was by proclamation, appointed for the first reading of the service; but, in order to sound the dispositions of the people, the council postponed the matter till the twenty-third day of July, and they even gave notice the Sunday before of their design to commence the use of the new liturgy. As this intimation had been received quietly, they imagined that they might safely proceed in their purpose, and accordingly, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, the dean of Edinburgh, arrayed in his surplice, began the service; both archbishops, many of the privy-council, and others of the best quality in Edinburgh, being present.

But no sooner had the dean opened the book, than a number of the meaner sort, with clapping their hands and outcries, made a great uproar; and one of them, called Jane or Jannot Gaddis, flung a little folding stool, whereon she had sat, at the dean's head, saying, "Out, thou false thief! dost thou say the mass at my lug!" which was followed with so great a noise and confusion, that none could hear or be heard; whereupon the bishop of Edinburgh stepped into the pulpit, and, hoping to appease the people, by putting them in mind that the place in which they were was holy ground, and by intreating them to desist from the profanation of it, they were the more enraged, throwing at him cudgels, stools, and what else was at hand, even to the endangering his life. Upon this the bishop of St. Andrew's, the chancellor, called down the provost and bailiffs of the city from their seats to their assistance, who (not without some difficulty) put the unruly people out of the church, and made fast the doors. This done, the dean proceeded to read the liturgy, the multitude the mean while rapping and pelting the windows with stones, to disturb the service; but, notwithstanding all their clamour the service was ended; though not the people's rage, who waiting the bishop's retiring to his lodging, so assaulted him, as (had he not been rescued by a strong hand) he had probably perished by their violence.

The same morning the service-book was read in the next church to St. Giles's, though not without noise and tumult, yet not so great as in the latter: in the Gray Friars church, Mr. Ramsey refused to read it, and was afterwards suspended for the same; but the elect bishop of Argyll, his colleague began to read it, but was so menaced, cursed, and exclaimed against, that he was forced to give over.

In the college-church of Rollock, one of the preachers, who the Sunday before, at the intimation of the reading, had much commended the book, and undertaken this day to read it, upon notice how it was received at the church of St. Giles, broke the promise he had made to read it, chusing rather to incur the censure of those of his fraternity, than to offend the multitude, whose favour he sought: but he was likewise suspended. The morning this passed, the council assembled at the lord-chancellor's lodgings, and sent for the provost and bailiffs, to advise with them how to prevent the like tumults in the afternoon; which they promised to endeavour, and was so effected that the book was read in the church of St. Giles, and some other churches, without any such disturbance as it had in the morning; only the bishop of Edinburgh, in his return to his lodging, was rudely treated by the populace.

No person of any rank was concerned in these violent proceedings, and every one affected to condemn the licentiousness of the giddy multitude: it was judged imprudent, however, to hazard a new insult, by any fresh attempt to read this liturgy, and the populace seemed for the present to be perfectly satisfied; but when it was known that the king, notwithstanding representations made to him on this head, still persisted in his resolution of establishing that worship, men began to contract a more inveterate prejudice against it; and the concourse of all ranks of people to Edinburgh on the first of October (the day on which the term begins there) was so great, that the council began to fear another riot, and published proclamations, signifying that the council should be transferred to Dundee; commanding all strangers to quit the city; and prohibiting a book, written against the English and popish ceremonies imposed upon the church of Scotland. These proclamations rather fomented than allayed the flame then begun; and the day after their publication, October 18, the populace broke out into the most violent disorder: they assaulted the bishop of Galloway, the earl of Traquair, lord high-treasurer, in the streets, and chased them into the chamber where the privy-council were sitting, and attacked the council itself: they treated the town-council in the same manner; and had it not been for the interposition of some popular lords, who had great influence with them, they would probably have proceeded to acts of the most desperate outrage. In this sedition the actors were of some better condition than in the former; though no person of rank seemed, as yet, to countenance them. Nevertheless the spirit of the people appeared so alarming, that the earl of Traquair repaired to London, in order to acquaint the king more fully of the matter: but Charles, listening only to the counsels of Laud, a man who seemed born for his destruction, resolved to carry every thing with a high hand, and to punish severely the authors of the late tumults, and ordered the earl of Traquair, on his return to Scotland, to publish a proclamation "declaring his abhorrence of popish superstition, and his intention to introduce nothing but what should tend to the advancement of religion in the kingdom of Scotland." He afterwards sent another to the council, which had been removed to Stirling, signifying his being willing to pardon the crime which the people had committed, in assembling, composing, signing, and presenting such petitions to the chancellor, provided they would return to their own houses, and live for the future as good and faithful subjects. He forbade them to assemble again, on pain of treason; ordered that no person should presume to approach Stirling without permission; and commanded all the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, not belonging to the council, or courts of justice, to quit that town in six hours; otherwise they should be declared traitors.

In the mean while the council had removed to Stirling, at a greater distance from Edinburgh.

Immediately after the publication of the proclamation, the earl of Hume and the lord Lindsey, accompanied by many other noblemen and a great concourse of people, repaired to the market-cross (of Stirling), and, without regarding the presence and authority of the council, read publicly a protest, importing, "that they insisted upon presenting their grievances to the king: that they would not submit to the bishops or judges, until they should have acquitted themselves of the crimes laid to their charge: that no proclamation, or act of council, resolved upon in presence of those prelates, should prejudice the protestors: that none of their associates should be exposed to any dangers in their lives and fortunes, nor incur any penalty, civil or ecclesiastical, for having refused to acquiesce in the said acts, books, canons, rites, jurisdictions, and proclamations, composed and published contrary to the decrees of the general assembly, or against the laws of the realm: that in case this dispute should occasion any disorder, it should not be imputed to them, inasmuch as the council refused to receive a remonstrance and declinatory, which they had lately presented; and that their petitions tended to nothing but the maintenance of the true religion in Scotland and to the honour of his majesty." The same protest was read at Linlithgow and Edinburgh.

This was the first time that the men of quality had appeared to countenance the proceedings of the people; but the spirit of discontent, which had been gradually spreading among all ranks of men, now blazed out at once, and the authority of the king and council were treated with equal contempt; for the next step of these mutineers was to establish four tables, as they called them, at Edinburgh; one was composed of nobility, another of gentry, a third of ministers, and a fourth of burghesses: the table of gentry consisted of several subordinate tables, according to their different counties; orders were issued by them, and every where executed with the most implicit obedience. Among the very first acts of this new-fangled institution was the Solemn League and Covenant, as if all laws, divine and human, were about to be abolished; and thus the natural desire of the great to support their own schemes on one side, and the fury of popular opposition on the other, lighted up the flames of civil war, which soon after desolated this wretched island.

The Solemn League and Covenant was no sooner published, than the people ran in crowds to subscribe it, and it was signed by almost all the persons of consequence in the kingdom, except the privy-counsellors, the judges, the bishops, and those who enjoyed places under the crown. There was prefixed to it the confession of faith of the kirk of Scotland, which had been signed by the late king James and his household, when he was about fourteen years of age, and had been renewed ten years afterwards: then, after a long recital of the acts of parliament, and a great deal of jargon against popery, and in praise of presbyterian purity and of protestant persecution on religious accounts, this instrument mentions the coronation-oath, which obliges the king "carefully to root out of his empire all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, who shall be convicted by the true spirit of God of the afore-said crimes:" and then it declares the true worship of God and the regal authority to be so strongly joined, as that they had the same common enemies, and did stand and fall together. The associates then proceeded to declare,

but in general terms, against all innovations in religion that had been introduced since the establishment of presbytery in that country; but without taking notice that the chief of those innovations had as much sanction, both from ecclesiastical and civil authority, as that establishment had, if not more. They then proceeded as follows to the material part of this association "We promise and swear, by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profession and obedience of the foresaid religion; that we shall defend the same, and resist all those contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmost of that power which God hath put in our hands, all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the same heart, we declare before God and men, that we have no intention nor desire to attempt any thing that may turn to the dishonour of God, or to the diminution of the king's greatness and authority; but, on the contrary, we promise and swear that we shall, to the uttermost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread sovereign the king's majesty's person and authority, in the defence and preservation of the foresaid true religion, liberties, and laws of the kingdom; as also to the mutual defence and assistance of every one of us of another, in the same cause of maintaining true religion and his majesty's authority with our best counsel, bodies, means, and whole power, against all sorts of persons whatsoever; so that whatsoever shall be done to the least of us for that cause, shall be taken as done to us all in general, and every one of us in particular: and that we shall not directly or indirectly suffer ourselves to be divided or withdrawn, with whatsoever suggestion, combination, allurements, or terror, from this blessed and loyal conjunction; nor shall cast in any lett or impediment that may stay or hinder any such resolution, as by common consent shall be found to conduce for some good ends: but, on the contrary shall, by all lawful means, labour to further and promote the same. And if any such dangerous and delusive motion shall be made to us, by word or writ, we, and every one of us, shall either suppress it, or, if need be, shall incontinent make the same known, that it may be timeously obviated. Neither do we fear the foul aspersions of rebellion, combination, or what else our adversaries, from their own craft and malice, would put upon us, seeing what we do is so well warranted, and ariseth from an unfeigned desire to maintain the true worship of God, the majesty of our king, and the peace of the kingdom, for the common happiness of ourselves and posterity."

I thought it indispensably necessary to give the reader some idea of this famous Solemn League and Covenant, which was so much extolled by its admirers, and decried by its opposers. Some writers have been pleased to represent it as a justifiable national effort, in defence of religion, and liberty; as the establishment of episcopal authority in Scotland had, according to them, been imposed by arbitrary power, the recognition of the people obtained by compulsion, in diametrical opposition to the sense of the nation: but, by the favour of these gentlemen, the civil liberties of the Scots had, so far as can be found by records, never been attacked by power; nor had prerogative (as in England) encroached upon the privileges handed down to them by their ancestors. The story of this famous Covenant lay in a kind of latent defeasance to the royal authority, when not employed in defence and propagation of what they called, or fancied, the true religion; the king must not only comply with all the absurdities of the associators, but he must draw the sword against every man who should presume to differ from them in point of religion. This was a matter so endless, that it is plain the Covenant, considered as an act of the people, independent of the royal authority, was calculated for a pretext to withdraw their obedience from lawful government, by giving them the power to prescribe their own terms for their return to it: nor can I apprehend the reproach or censure of men of candor and enlightened understanding, in declaring it as my opinion, that it was as daring an insult as ever was offered to a king, and as rebellious a measure as ever was formed by a people. But to return from this digression, which I hope the reader will the more readily pardon, as it is meant to remove the mist of prejudice, and weaken the power of sounds, which are too often found to captivate the vulgar and unwary.

It was not then known who fomented the disturbances in Scotland, that prepared the way for the tragical end of Charles I. It was cardinal Richelieu, the most daring and most insolent minister that perhaps ever appeared in Europe. He had formed connexions with the prince of Orange and the States General for reducing the house of Austria; but despairing of success, unless he could prevail on Charles to stand neutral, he sent the count d'Estrades to England, the last year, to offer Charles his own terms, if he would engage in the interests of France; but having received a refusal from that monarch, rather more haughty than politic, it had exasperated him. There is a letter of the cardinal to d'Estrades (dated December 2, 1637,) in which are these remarkable words: "before the end of twelve months, the king and queen of England shall repent their having refused the offers you made them from his majesty, and shall soon know that I am not despicable." He had a priest, one Chambers by name, and by birth a Scotchman, who was his almoner; this man he sent to London and Edinburgh, in order to stir up a spirit of discontent among the presbyterians, partly by his rhetoric, and partly by the proper application of certain sums of money: all which is incontestably proved by the above letter.

It was now the year 1638. The king began to be apprehensive for the consequences of the commotions in Scotland; he therefore sent the marquis of Hamilton as his high-commissioner, and empowered him to treat with the covenanters, and offered them, in his name, a suspension of the canons and the liturgy, until they could be introduced in a fair and legal manner. Nothing is so despicable as a hated government when it becomes impotent: the covenanters, now sixty thousand strong, knew that Charles possessed no regular forces in either of his kingdoms; and therefore, when Hamilton proposed their renouncing and abolishing the Covenant, as a rebellious and undutiful association against their sovereign, they plainly told him, that "they could not acknowledge that they had ever departed from their obedience; and for their Covenant, they would rather renounce their baptism than abate one syllable thereof." Hamilton, finding all his endeavours to re-establish quiet ineffectual, returned to London, made another journey to Edinburgh, returned again to London, and was immediately sent back with still more satisfactory orders, importing, "that the king revoked the Liturgy, the Book of Canons, the High Commission, and the Five Articles of Perth; that, for the future the bishops should be censurable by the general assembly; that all subjects of Scotland should subscribe the confession of faith, with an oath annexed, very different from that of the Covenant." Then he convoked a general assembly at Glasgow, for the month of November; and a parliament at Edinburgh, to meet in May of the following year. The tables protested against the proclamation, because the new oath, obliging them to maintain the religion at present professed, would operate in favour of the innovations which had been confirmed by acts of parliament. An accusation signed by a great number of noblemen, gentlemen, ministers, and burghers, was presented by the presbytery of Edinburgh against the bishops, alleging, "that they had not adhered to the conditions on which the general assembly at Montrose, in the preceding reign consented to their being admitted to parliament." By these they were obliged only to act as deputies of the church; to propose nothing without express orders of the church: to consent to nothing but what should be to the advantage of the church, on pain of deprivation; and to be accountable to the general assembly for their conduct in parliament. When the day of meeting arrived, the commissioner plainly perceived that the lay interest predominated in the assembly, in the number of elders that were returned; and all that he could do for the service of the king, was to encourage and promote disputes, that would furnish him with a pretence to dissolve them. The bishops presented a declinatory, pronouncing the assembly null; and the commissioner entered a number of protests against their proceedings: at length, finding them determined to sit in judgment upon the bishops, he on the seventh day of their session, dissolved the assembly as illegal, "because they had not introduced lay elders to vote in their deliberations; because the members had been chosen by lay elders, contrary to custom; because those few members to whom the tables were averse, had been rejected, without reason; and the bishops were in danger of being tried by those who were their professed enemies." Notwithstanding this sentence of dissolution, the assembly of Glasgow continued itself by virtue of its own authority, and passed acts, by which they not only condemned the liturgy, canons, and high-commission, excommunicated fourteen bishops, and abjured episcopal government; but they likewise presumed to reverse divers acts of parliament in favour of episcopacy, and to annul the subscription of those who had signed the confession of faith, according to the king's order; nay, they even explained that confession as virtually implying an abolition of episcopacy. The commissioner published another explanation, to prove that episcopacy did subsist, and that every person who signed the commission was bound to support it: and this again was answered by the assembly. In a word, the whole fabrick, which Charles and James, in a long course of years, had been rearing with so much care and industry, was at once thrown to the ground; the Covenant was also ordered to be subscribed by every one, under pain of excommunication.

The marquis seeing all things tending to a present rupture, sent to desire leave of the king to return to England, which he obtained: but before he went he saw an end to the Glasgow assembly, which broke up after having, by their own authority, ordained annual assemblies, the first whereof was appointed to meet at Edinburgh, the first day of July in the following year. As soon the marquis was gone the associators drew up a declaration, addressed to all good Christians of England, to justify their intentions and actions, which had so many undutiful expressions in it, that it was suppressed by the king's authority, who published a declaration to satisfy his faithful subjects of the seditious practices of those in Scotland who had, under pretext of religion, designed the subversion of his royal authority; which was commanded to be read in all churches.

Such was the state of affairs in Scotland at the end of the year 1638. As to the transactions in England, they are hardly worth mention, but so far as they relate to Scotland.

On the last of October this year, Mary de Medicis, widow of Henry IV. of France, and mother to the reigning monarch, Lewis XIII. having, by the cabals of cardinal Richelieu, the prime minister, been driven out of France, came into England, where she met with a noble reception from Charles and his queen. While she staid here, she was lodged in the king's palace of St. James's; but finding the king likely to be involved in great trouble to reduce his rebellious subjects in Scotland, after some months stay she departed for Holland.

Laud this year commenced a prosecution against Williams, bishop of Lincoln, late lord-keeper, to whom he was an implacable enemy; and, upon the shameful pretence of his having concealed a letter written to him by one Mr. Osbaldiston, in which mention was made of a "little urchin" and "a great man" which Laud interpreted to have been himself, was fined eight thousand pounds for receiving libellous letters: and Osbaldiston, who was master of Westminster school, by flight escaped his censure, which was, to have his ears nailed to the pillory, before his own school, and to be deprived of all his preferments, and fined five thousand pounds to the king. This unjustifiable severity swelled the load of popular clamour against Laud.

The laws of historical truth will not permit me to conceal, that Charles appears to have no great sincerity in the concession he had made to the Covenanters; and that he waited only for a fair opportunity to retract them. He had, for some months, by Hamilton's advice, been making warlike preparations, though with infinite caution and secrecy. When we consider the intriguing genius of rebellion, and that Charles had commissioned his arms and ammunition from Holland, we can scarcely suppose the heads of the Covenanters not to have received, both from France and England, information of Charles's designs: this may account for their proceedings during the latter part of the preceding year, and the beginning of 1639, when they began to make vigorous preparations for war on their side. They sent for succours to such of the neighbouring princes and states from whom they could expect any assistance.

sistance. They also invited home many eminent commanders of their nation from Sweden and Holland, to take employment in their armies; many of whom, at the beginning of the year came to them: they seized upon the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton, and all other places of strength in the kingdom; and took out of Dalkeith all the king's arms and ammunition, laid up there the year before by the marquis of Hamilton. Next they chose Alexander Lesly, an old experienced officer, to be captain-general of their armies, to whom all the chief of the confederates (who took arms) solemnly swore obedience in all orders of war; and he swore in like manner faithfully to exercise his charge. The marquis of Argyll was sent to take care of the frontiers opposite to Ireland; the earl of Montrose had the charge of Aberdeen and the most northern parts; and colonel Monro was sent towards the Borders of England, to keep all things quiet till the levies were perfected.

When Charles found that his designs were discovered, and had received the copy of their last declaration, he lost all patience, and formed a resolution of proceeding openly in the way of arms, and on the twenty-sixth of January, 1639, a writ was sent to the nobility to attend the royal standard at York. On this occasion the king had recourse to the English clergy, and even to the catholics of the kingdom, who equally hated the presbyterians, and only furnished the king with money, because they looked upon this as a religious war. The English nobility in general shewed great alacrity for his service; and those who secretly wished well to the Covenanters were obliged to dissemble, and vie with the others in forwardness; but nothing could exceed the generosity and loyalty of those noblemen who composed the king's privy-council, who, on this occasion, contributed the greatest part of their fortunes for their master's service. Laud and the marquis of Hamilton signalized themselves particularly by their contributions; and Wentworth, the lord-deputy of Ireland (about the same time created earl of Strafford) alone gave twenty-thousand pounds; he also drew down a body of men towards the sea-coasts of that kindom, opposite to the earl of Argyll's country, who had now joined the Covenanters, and thereby prevented a very dangerous junction between the disaffected of both kingdoms. Charles himself, by regular œconomy, had amassed a sum of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which he reserved for any sudden emergency; and by all these means he was enabled to equip a very considerable fleet and army: the former consisted of sixteen large ships, was furnished with five thousand land forces, and was commanded by the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to sail to the Firth of Forth, and to make a diversion in the forces of the enemy.

The army amounted to about twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and was conducted by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but distinguished neither for his military nor political abilities; the earl of Essex, a man of strict honour, and extremely beloved by the soldiers, acted as lieutenant-general; and the earl of Holland was general of the horse.

The king himself repaired to the camp, and summoned all the noblemen of England to attend him. The whole had rather the appearance of a splendid court than a military armament; and in this situation, carrying more show than real force with it, the army arrived at Berwick on the twenty-eighth of May, with the king at its head, and there encamped. The Scottish army, which was nearly equal in number to that of the king, marched, at the same time, under general Lesly, towards the borders of England, and encamped within four miles of Berwick.

The king had, in the beginning of this year, set forth a declaration, containing his reasons for this expedition, in which he displayed the insolent treatment he had met with from the Covenanters, and his own readiness to heal the disorders of the state, in such terms, that it had a wonderful effect in his favour in Scotland. The marquis of Huntley declared for him, and this was no small accession of strength, for Huntley had a large estate, but a much larger following; and was looked upon to be the only nobleman who could balance the numbers which Argyll could bring into the field. But, to the inexpressible misfortune of Charles's affairs, this nobleman was at this time, when he was most wanted, taken from his sovereign; for the marquis of Montrose, having enticed him to a conference, and positively refusing to sign the Covenant, he and his eldest son were sent prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh. This unlucky accident was generally attributed to Hamilton, who having secured Holy Island to the king's obedience, had entered the Forth, and published a proclamation from Charles, offering pardon to the rebels who should lay down their arms, but with orders to prosecute all others with fire and sword. Hamilton continued a shameful inactivity; and, while in Holy Island, he received a visit from his mother, a most rigid Covenanter. This, with the general tenor of his conduct, made many of the king's friends suspect his integrity; and the Scots themselves were commonly heard to say, "they knew the son of such a mother would not do them hurt."

The troops under Lesly were but ill armed, for they had not three thousand musquets amongst them all; so that, notwithstanding their vapouring, they were much better prepared for a treaty than a battle. But their countrymen about the king's person and in his army, most infamously betrayed him, by magnifying the strength of the rebels, and at the same time giving them intelligence of every thing that was transacted between Charles and his council; and the king seeing his noblemen and followers as generally averse to the prosecution of the war, expressed his wishes for an opportunity to terminate it without bloodshed. The Covenanters, apprized of his inclinations, wrote in a very humble strain to the earls of Arundel, Essex, and Holland, imploring their good offices with his majesty, and protesting that nothing was farther from their thoughts than any design to invade England. Essex, who both hated and despised the Scots, would not deign to answer their letter, which he sent to the king: but the other two noblemen were differently affected; they thought the Covenanters had reason on their side, and turned their thoughts towards a pacification. When those letters had produced their effect, the lord Dumfermling arrived from the Scottish camp with a trumpet, and presented to the king an humble application, beseeching his majesty to appoint commissioners for a treaty. Charles desired that the last proclamation he sent to Edinburgh should be read in the Scottish army; general Lesly complied with this request; and then he appointed six commissioners to treat with the insurgents. The conferences soon produced the following convention for peace, which was signed on the seventeenth of June.

Scottish

“ I. The forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved within twenty-four hours after the agreement of the king's declaration.

“ II. The king's castles, forts, and ammunition, to be delivered up, after the said publication, as soon as he shall send to receive them.

“ III. His ships to depart presently after the delivery of the castles; and in the mean time no interruption of trade.

“ IV. All persons goods and ships detained by the king since the first of November, to be restored.”

“ V. No meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations, of any of the Scots, but such as are warranted by act of parliament.

“ VI. All fortifications to desist, and to be remitted to the king's pleasure.

“ VII. To restore to every one therein, liberties, lands, houses, goods, and means whatsoever, taken and detained from them by whatsoever means, since the first of November last.”

The next day the king, on his part, signed a declaration, in which he was pleased to confirm all that had been granted by the marquis of Hamilton, and “that all matters ecclesiastical shall be determined by the assemblies of the kirk, and matters civil by the parliament, and other inferior judicatories established by law; which assemblies shall be kept once a year, or as shall be agreed upon by the general assembly, and our commissioner for the time being.”

“ That a free and general assembly be kept at Edinburgh the sixth day of August next, where we intend (God willing) to be personally present; and thereafter a parliament the twentieth of August, and there an act of oblivion to be passed; and that upon their disarming and disbanding of their forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended tabernacles and conventicles, and restoring to the king all his castles, forts, and ammunition, as also his royal honours; and to every one of his good subjects, their liberties, lands, houses, goods, and means whatsoever, taken and detained since the late pretended general assembly; the king will, presently thereafter, recall his fleet, and retire his forces, and cause restitution of their ships and goods, taken since the aforesaid time.”

The pacification being thus agreed, the king sent for some of the Scots lords, and informed them, that he had given orders to the marquis of Hamilton to draw off the fleet, and did intend to have been at Edinburgh at the opening of the assembly; but that he had received letters from the queen, which intimated a necessity of his presence in London about some parliamentary affairs; but he would depute the earl of Traquair, with full power and authority, as his high commissioner, to hold the assembly and the parliament.

It was generally thought, that the concessions made by the king would have brought the malecontents to a perfect submission, but they soon appeared to have entertained very different thoughts, and to have entered into treaty only to temporize, and that the overtures they made for a pacification were partly out of deference to their correspondents in England, and partly with a view to fix the odium of any subsequent rupture upon the king and his council, for they did not punctually perform any one article; they disbanded their troops in such a manner that they could be re-assembled with the utmost facility and dispatch. A great part of the walls of the castle of Edinburgh being fallen down, and the lord Ruthven, who held that fortress for the king, setting about to repair the breach, the covenanters would not suffer the workmen and materials to enter; at the same time that they themselves went on repairing the strong holds in their hands, continuing their meetings and consultations, and terrifying or prosecuting all who were not their friends; and, in order to get the populace still more on their side, they published and dispersed a scandalous libel, intitled, “ Some conditions of his majesty's treaty with the subjects of Scotland before the English nobility.”

This paper consisted of eight heads, which were pretended to be drawn out of notes taken upon the several discourses held with the king about the subject of his declaration: the matter of it was highly scandalous, and derogatory to the king's honour; for all the substance of the royal declaration was thereby altered, and the intention of it perverted. This affair gave Charles great disquiet; and on the fourth of August he called a council, in which the paper was read; and the counsellors who had been present at the conference upon the treaty, unanimously agreed, that the contents of the paper were “ notoriously false, and contrary to what his majesty clearly expressed at the pacification.” His majesty likewise declared (as appears by the minutes of the council which were afterwards turned into a proclamation) “ That before his coming from Berwick, he shewed a copy of this scandalous paper to the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Holland, master treasurer, and master secretary Cook, who fully concurred in the aforesaid opinion with the lords; all which lords, and particularly the earl of Holland, avowed the falseness thereof before the faces of those Scottish lords who were believed to be the divulgers of it (the lords of the council of Scotland being the likewise present); all which considered, the whole board became humble petitioners to his majesty, that this false and scandalous paper might be publicly burned by the hangman; and that his majesty's pleasure might be published by proclamation, “ that no person or persons hereafter, of what degree or condition soever, presume to keep any copy thereof; but that within five days after the said proclamation published, every such person and persons shall deliver to the next justice of the peace, at his or their dwelling, all and every copy and copies thereof; the same to be by the said justices of peace immediately brought or sent to one of his majesty's principal secretaries, on penalty of incurring the uttermost of such punishment and penalties as by the law of this realm are to be inflicted upon those that keep such scandalous and seditious papers.”

Upon the sixth of August (old stile), the general assembly met at Edinburgh, according to the royal proclamation, and sat till the twenty-fourth: the chief matters were, the confirmation of the act of the Glasgow assembly, the abolishing of episcopacy, the five articles of Perth, the high-commission court, the liturgy, and the book of canons; and it ended with an address of thanks to the king, for his indulgence towards them, in the assent of his commissioner to their acts; and then another assembly was appointed to be held at Aberdeen the next year, in the month of July.

The assembly now risen, the parliament, which had been prorogued from the twentieth to the thirtieth of August, came together; the first four days of its session produced a high debate about settling their constitution, to determine what estate should supply the order of bishops, now abolished; which being at last agreed, they fell upon other matters and measures, tending rather totally to eclipse the royal power, and new model the government, than to reform abuses or restore the public tranquillity; in fine, they were proceeding to the most unwarrantable, as well as undutiful, lengths, when Charles sent orders to Traquair, the high commissioner, to interrupt their proceedings, by proroguing them till the second day of June, in the following year; and, should he meet with any opposition, to declare those members who should continue sitting, guilty of high-treason. The parliament, upon receiving the order, immediately separated; but not before the members had drawn up a declaration, importing, "That the earl of Traquair and the council had violated the privileges of parliament; that though they had a right to sit, notwithstanding the prorogation, they were willing to separate, in order to give the king a proof of their obedience. Nevertheless, they left a committee to present an humble petition to his majesty, which was accordingly transmitted to London by the earl of Dumfirling and the lord Loudon, appointed their deputies for that purpose; but the king would not favour them with an audience, because they had undertaken their journey without the leave of the high-commissioner. After their return to their own country, Traquair being called to court, reported to the council the transactions which had passed in Scotland; and it was unanimously resolved, that the Scots should be reduced to their duty by force of arms. And thus matters stood between the king and that people at the close of the year 1639. Let us now look a little back to the affairs of England.

Charles, prince palatine of the Rhine, arrived at the court of England in July this year, in prosecution of a design he had to get the command of the army of Bernard duke of Saxe Weymar, lately dead; which consisted of a great number of Swedes, Germans, and other nations: the king approving the design, proposed it to the French ambassador, offering that the prince should join in a perpetual league with France, and that he would contribute what he could to his assistance. The French ambassador seemed to be very well pleased with the offer; and told the king that he doubted not but his master would approve of it, and that cardinal Richelieu, the chief minister of state, would be willing to serve the king and the prince therein; and thereupon he dispatched a messenger to Paris, to acquaint the French king with the matter: but in the mean while it was suggested to the king, that Richelieu clandestinely fomented the troubles in Scotland, whereby the confederate Covenanters had been encouraged to write a letter to that king for assistance; so that the good faith of Richelieu was not to be depended on: wherefore the prince was advised to go privately through France to the duke's army; but Richelieu getting intelligence of his being on the way, and deeming this secret act a contravention of the treaty then depending, he had the prince arrested at Lyons, and kept under a strict guard.

In the summer of this year, while Charles was settling the affairs of Scotland, an accident happened upon the coast of England, which is of too great consequence to be passed over in history, this was a sea-fight between the two navies of Spain and Holland, in the Downs; which we shall insert in the words of sir John Pennington, the king's vice-admiral, who has left us the following narrative thereof.

"The Spanish Fleet, consisting of near seventy sail, bound and designed for Dunkirk, in Flanders, with a recruit both of men and money, met with the vice-admiral of the Holland fleet, having in his company seventeen small ships, September 7, and entered a very fierce dispute with them, until the Hollander, perceiving himself too weak, got to the windward, sailing alone towards Dunkirk, and continually firing their ordnance, to give warning to their admiral, who lay before that town with the residue of the fleet. In the first encounter the Hollanders had two ships sunk; and the next morning, by two o'clock, the admiral came up, and joining the vice-admiral between Dover and Calais, they attacked the Spaniards, and continued a very sharp fight till past noon, wherein they had much the better, having taken two galleons, sunk another, and much shattered the rest, though they were but twenty-five sail to sixty and upwards, and at length forced them upon the English coasts near Dover, where they left them, and bore off for the coast of France, not willing to attempt any thing against them within the king of England's liberties.

"The Spaniards being now got, as thought, under the lee of England's protection, began to plot how to get rid of their bad neighbour; and the Spanish resident importuned the king's protection two tides, that in the interim they might have an opportunity for slipping away for Spain; but the king being in amity with both nations resolved to stand neuter; and whereas the Spaniards had hired some English ships to transport their soldiers to Dunkirk, the king, upon the complaint of the Dutch ambassador, strictly commanded that none should take in any Spaniards, nor pass beyond Gravesend without licence: but the Spaniards and Hollands, plotting a great while counter the one to the other, the Spaniard at length somewhat outwitted his enemy, and, by a stratagem, in the night conveyed away fourteen Dunkirk ships, having on board four thousand men.

"In the beginning of October the king sent the earl of Arundel to the admiral of Spain, don Antonio d'Oquendo, desiring him to depart by the first fair wind, because he would not that they should engage within his seas; but the wind continued easterly so long (a thing not usual in that season) as the Hollanders got daily fresh supplies from Zealand, so at length their fleet was completed to an hundred ships, wherewith they encompassed their enemies within pistol-shot, for four days: but that which was so long an interview of those two fleets at length turned to an engagement.

"On the eleventh of the same month Van Trump, the Dutch admiral, charged the Spaniards with cannon and fireships so furiously, as made them all cut their cables; and being fifty-three in number, twenty-twenty-three ran on shore and were stranded in the Downs, whereof three were burned, two sunk, and two perished on the shore; one of these was a great galleon, the vice-admiral of Galicia, commanded by don Antonio de Castro, which mounted fifty-two pieces of brass ordnance: the remainder of the twenty-three, stranded and deserted by the Spaniards, were manned by the English, to save them from the Dutch. The other thirty Spanish ships, under the command of the admiral, don Antonio d'Oquendo, and Lopez, admiral of Portugal, put to sea, and kept in close order till a great fog fell upon them, when the Dutch, taking the advantage thereof, interposed between the admirals and their fleets and fought them valiantly till the fog cleared up, when the admiral of Portugal was set on fire by two Dutch fire-ships; which d'Oquendo perceiving, he presently took his course towards Dunkirk, with the admiral of that place and some few ships more, for most of the rest were taken; of these thirty-two were sent to Holland, three perished on the coast of France, one near Dover, five sunk in their flight, and only ten escaped."

Charles did not fail to represent this conduct of the Dutch as an insult upon the British flag, and made use of it as an argument for enforcing the payment of ship-money, so as to be able to keep a sufficient fleet at sea, to curb the insolence of those republicans: accordingly new writs were issued throughout all the counties of England and Wales for collecting this hateful tax. Some time before this the lord-keeper Coventry, having with an unusual good fortune kept the great-seal many years, died in the exercise of that high office, upon which the great-seal was given to sir John Finch, chief-justice of the Common Pleas, a devoted tool to Laud, by whose violent counsels, and that of his faction, Charles was entirely guided, and pushed on to go forward, through all difficulties, to the establishment of prerogative. We now come to the year 1640.

The king having determined upon the war with Scotland, tried every expedient to raise a powerful army; but soon found that, his Exchequer being exhausted, and great debts contracted, his ordinary revenues would not be sufficient to maintain his forces; a parliament therefore, after above eleven years intermission, after trying many irregular expedients, after many and great disgusts given to the nation by arbitrary impositions, must now be assembled, in order to supply the exigences of the crown; and it was resolved by Laud, Wentworth earl of Stafford (now returned from the government of Ireland), and Hamilton, who were Charles's principal friends and counsellors, to issue writs for the great assembly of the nation to sit in the ensuing April. In the mean time the Dutch sent a splendid embassy, with excuses for the late conduct of their fleet on the British coasts, and a proposal of marriage between the prince of Orange and Charles's eldest daughter, of which more hereafter. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general of the army destined to act against Scotland.

The parliament meeting on the twenty-third of April, was opened by a speech from the lord-keeper Finch, to which Charles made a short preface, concerning the necessity of their meeting. When Finch had ended his speech, Charles informed them, that some time before the earl of Traquair having intercepted a letter wrote to the king of France by the Scottish malecontents, had transmitted it to him, and that he had thereupon committed to the Tower the lord Loudon, commissioner from the Covenanters, one of the persons who had subscribed the treasonable letter, which he now produced, hoping thereby to inflame the parliament by the indignity, and alarm them by the danger of this application to a foreign power. This letter, which was indeed a convincing proof that there was nothing too desperate for the Covenanters to stick at, for compassing their ends, was conceived in the follow terms;

" Sir,

" Your majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted princes and states, we have found it necessary to send this gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to represent unto your majesty the candour and ingenuity as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions, which we desire to be engraven and written in the whole world with a beam of the sun, as well as to your majesty. We therefore most humbly beseech you (sir) to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he shall say on our part; touching us and our affairs, being most assured (sir) of your assistance equal to your wonted clemency heretofore, and so often shewed to this nation, which will not yield the glory to any other whatsoever, to be eternally, sir, your majesty's most obedient and most affectionate servants,

Roths, Montrose, Lesley, Marr, Montgomery, Loudon, Forrester."

When the commons returned to their house, they chose serjeant Glanville to be their speaker. The arguments of the king and his minister to get from them a speedy aid, and adequate to the great projects he had formed of reducing the malecontents of Scotland to a state of perfect submission, made no impression upon them: they knew, from former experience, that Charles would remember his promises no longer than he could be compelled by necessity, they therefore resolved to adhere to their old and constitutional maxim of redressing the grievances of the nation before they should grant a supply to the crown. This untoward disposition in the commons was chiefly imputed to the machinations of sir Henry Vane, who had been made secretary of state in the room of old Cooke, who, with many others had been turned out for advising the late pacification with the Scots. Vane, it seems, bore an inveterate grudge to the earl of Strafford, on whom the king had, at his creation, bestowed the additional title of baron Raby, to which the former aspired, as being a manor granted him, together with Barney castle, from the crown; and because he saw Strafford (at whose instance the parliament had been principally called) desirous for the king to gain the affections of the commons, in order to obtain from them the necessary supplies; he resolved to exert his utmost endeavours to frustrate this design. He had, in the king's name proposed to the house, that if they would vote twelve subsidies, amounting to about six hundred thousand pounds, to be made payable in three years, and pass it into a law immediately, with a clause that it should not determine the session, his majesty would not only abstain from levying ship-money, but even consent to its being utterly abolished, in any manner they should judge convenient. Vane, inspiring Charles with an idea of making this proposal, seems to have been perfectly well acquainted with the disposition of the members of the house of commons, and how favourable it was to his design of embroiling the king with them. This proposal produced violent debates: the commons thought no argument, more unfavourable, could possibly be urged for a supply, than an offer to abolish ship-money; a taxation the most illegal, and the most dangerous, which had ever, in any reign, been imposed on the nation: and they imagined, that, by bargaining for the remission of that duty, they would seem, in a manner, to acknowledge the authority by which it had been levied; or, at least, give encouragement for assuming new claims of a like nature, in hopes of resigning them on like advantageous terms: and, for these reasons, they resolved to pay no regard to the king's solicitations, but to continue the examination and redress of the public grievances.

Things were now come to the crisis Vane wished for: Charles was incensed to the highest degree at the unreasonable obstinacy of the commons; and this treacherous member, taking advantage of his perturbation, insinuated that he had it from good authority, that in a day or two the commons intended to pass a vote against the war with Scotland; and Charles unhappily believing the report, which, by all that appears by the journals of the proceedings of the house, was entirely groundless, repaired on the morrow (being the fifth of May) to the house of peers, where he dissolved the parliament. The marquis of Hamilton has not escaped the censure of some well-informed historians on this action, which in the end proved fatal to Charles, in order to embroil the king's affairs, to confirm the Scots, and distract the English, with a view to work his own advantages on both.

Indeed no step could have been taken more proper to exercise the reigning spirit of discontent among the people, who usually repose the most entire confidence in their representatives, and expect from them the redress of all their grievances. But as if this had not been thought enough to ruin Charles in the minds of his subjects, he was, by his violent counsellors, prevailed on to renew those acts of arbitrary power which, from former experience, he might have learned were so dangerous and unpopular. Bellasis and sir John Hotham were cited before the council; and refusing to give any account of their conduct in parliament, were thrown into prison. Crew, the chairman of the committee of religion, was ordered to deliver up all the complaints and petitions presented to the committee; and on his refusing to produce them, he was sent to the Tower. The studies and even the pockets of the earl of Warwick and lord Brooke were searched, before the expiration of privilege, in hopes of finding some treasonable papers.

Though the parliament was dissolved, the convocation continued sitting, under the name of a synod, to the twenty-ninth of May, and enacted certain canons. Among these there was one that obliged all ecclesiastics, and such as had received degrees in the universities, to take an oath, importing, that they approved of the doctrine and discipline of the church of England; and that they never would consent to any alteration of the church-government, by archbishops, bishops, deans, archdeacons, &c. After having settled their canons and this oath, which they had no legal power to impose, they granted a large subsidy, for the maintenance of the Scottish war, and then separated.

The dissolution of this parliament was by the people thought to be the work of the archbishop of Canterbury; this raised the popular hatred against him to the highest pitch: and on the ninth of May a paper was posted upon the Old Exchange, by one John Lilburne, exciting the apprentices to rise and rife his house at Lambeth on the Monday following; of which the archbishop having notice, made provision of some quantity of arms and ammunition for his defence. In the dead of the night preceding the appointed day, five hundred of the rabble beset his house, and strove to force an entrance, but were repulsed, and forced to depart with only denouncing their anger in seditious language against him, and breaking the windows of his palace. The next day many of them were apprehended, and confined in the White Lion prison, in Southwark: but within three days after, a number of their accomplices assembled, broke open the prison, and rescued them: nevertheless one of the ringleaders of the first riot was retaken, arraigned, condemned, hanged, drawn, and quartered on the twenty-first of May.

It seemed as if Charles had studied to set all ranks of people against him, for instead of soothing the city of London in the present delicate situation of circumstances, he prosecuted it in the Star-chamber for certain misdemeanors committed at Londonderry, in Ireland, which had been peopled by the city, and condemned it in a very heavy fine. He continued to raise all the taxes which had been so loudly inveighed against in parliament. Such a conduct in an absolute prince would have occasioned a revolt among his subjects, much more in a limited monarch. Unsupported by his parliament, he was now obliged to have recourse to the generosity of individuals, and so much interest did he possess among the courtiers and ministers, that above three hundred thousand pounds were subscribed in a few days.

The earl of Northumberland had been appointed general of the king's army, now augmented to twenty thousand men, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horse; but Northumberland being about this time seized with a dangerous illness, could not take upon him the command; as to Strafford, it seems his presence was absolutely necessary in England, to direct the affairs of the council; Charles therefore went himself in person so soon as the queen, then great with-child, was delivered of her son Henry, who was born at Oatlands, on the twentieth of July. But in the mean time the army was ordered to march northward; and lord Conway marched with the van some days before the rest could come up: and as he was advancing, news was brought him, that the Scottish army, under general Lesly, was marched to Dunce, not far from Berwick, where they had taken up their quarters the preceding year. Upon this advice he ordered the army to hasten towards Newcastle; but before they reached that place, intelligence came that the Scottish army had entered England on the twentieth tieth of August. The king received advice of this on his way to York, and dispatched orders to Conway to do what he could to impede their march till the army could come up. Upon this Conway called a council of war, the result of which was, that they should seize the pass at Newborne upon Tyne, to prevent the Scots possessing themselves of Newcastle, where sir Jacob Astly had newly entered with his regiment, but had not time to erect any fortifications. The king made all the haste he could; but by that time he reached North Allerton, about two days march on this side Newcastle, the lord Conway sent to him an account of the defeat of the forces under his command, which he received at Newborne, on the twenty-seventh of August.

In consequence of their success at Newborne, the Scots entered Newcastle without opposition: as for Conway, he retired with precipitation to Durham, and thinking himself not safe in that place, returned to North Allerton, where he found the main army, which also retreated to York. In the mean while, the Scots entered Newcastle peaceably and under the most solemn protestation of friendship, which they soon violated by treating the inhabitants of the town and neighbouring country in all respects as a conquered people; nor does it even appear that any precautions were taken by the English officers to prevent the king's magazines of powder and ammunition from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Charles arrived at York on the twenty-third of August: and, after assembling the gentlemen there, he and the earl of Strafford did all they could to animate them to the service of their country. They had advanced as far as North Allerton with their whole army, when they heard of lord Conway's defeat, on which they retreated to York, that they might be joined by the troops that were marching from Newcastle to Durham; and the whole to all appearance, composed a very fine army.

It was doubtless mortifying to Charles to be reduced to submit to the insolence of rebels, and hold a parley with the avowed enemies of his royal state and dignity; but what could he do? he saw a visible coldness in the officers and common men of his army, which gave him the most dreadful apprehensions that they would not fight against the Scots: the great county of York, instead of raising men for his service, presented a petition against his measures: in fine, he saw no other method of stopping the progress of the Covenanters, than by complying with their proposal.

While these things were in agitation, an address was presented from the city of London, petitioning for a parliament, as the only method of healing the distempered state. This petition encouraged the earls of Bedford, Essex, Hertford, Warwick, Bristol, and Mulgrave, the lords Say and Seale, Howard of Escrick, Bolingbroke, Mandeville, Brooke, and Paget, to present another of the like tendency. In these, and a thousand other distracting circumstances, the only expedient that Charles and his friends could think of, was somewhat between a parliament and a council, and was revived from very remote antiquity; this was, to summon a council of the English peers at York.

On the twenty-fourth of September this great council met, and Charles opened it with a speech, in which he demanded their advice upon two points: the first was, what answer to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated; the second, how to get money for keeping his army together until a parliamentary supply should be raised. After various debates, it was resolved to name commissioners for treating with the Scots; these were, the earls of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, Salisbury, Warwick, Bristol, Holland, and Berkshire, viscount Mandeville, the lords Wharton, Paget, Brooke, Pawlet, Howard, Saville, and Dunsmore: the earls of Traquair, Morton, and Lanerk, were named as assistants to these commissioners, to remove any difficulties that could arise from their ignorance of the constitution and affairs of Scotland; and secretary Vane, Mr. Lewis Stuart, and sir John Burroughs, were to assist in like manner upon the part of the English commissioners. It was first proposed, as most consistent with the king's dignity, that the treaty should be held at York; but the Scots, not so much from any real apprehensions they had of danger, as to increase the odium against Strafford, refused to come to any place where he had power; and, after various consultations, Rippon was appointed to be the place of meeting. All this while the inhabitants of the northern counties, that had been laid under contribution by the Scots, made dreadful complaints to Charles of their oppression; and, in order to keep the English army together, instructions were given by the great council to the earls of Manchester, Pembroke, and Clare, the viscount Camden, with the lords Coventry and Goring, to treat with the city of London for the loan of two hundred thousand pounds. The commissioners for the Scots were the earl of Dumfermling, lord Loudon, sir Patrick Hepburn, sir William Douglas, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Johnston.

The conferences were opened at Rippon on the first of October, and the Scots commissioners presented the following propositions, in the form of a petition: "That his majesty would be pleased to cause the acts of the last general assembly to be ratified in parliament: that the castle of Edinburgh, and all places of strength in Scotland, should be employed for no other purpose but the defence of the kingdom: that the Scots in England and Ireland should not incur any penalty for having subscribed the Covenant, nor be subjected to oaths or subscriptions contrary to the laws of the realm: that the authors of these troubles should be punished as incendiaries, according to their demerits: that the ships taken from the Scots should be restored with all their merchandize; and all damage to be repaired: that they should be indemnified for all the losses they had sustained since the beginning of the troubles: that the proclamations declaring them traitors, should be revoked; and that his majesty would, with the advice of the English parliament, withdraw the garrisons from the frontiers: that a free communication and commerce between the two nations be restored." They likewise demanded, in an insolent manner, forty thousand pounds per month for maintaining their army, during the treaty. Charles would gladly have consented that both armies should have been disbanded, but he could not prevail; and he now saw that nothing advantageous to him could result from the interview at Rippon: he therefore endeavoured to transfer the conferences to York, where the great council continued sitting; but he was again disappointed through the refusal of the Scots. His own commissioners pressed him to remove the treaty from Rippon to London, to which he was obliged to comply, and also to a cessation of arms, by which the Scots were assured of maintenance for their army; and the river Tees was made the boundary for both parties. This cessation was concluded on the twenty-sixth of October, and the commissioners returned to York, where Charles found himself obliged to ratify all they had done in granting the demands of the Scots. Thus was this unhappy prince humbled, to receive law from his rebels, and directions from his subjects.

Charles finding the general sense of the nation was so declared for a parliament, had in his speech to the great council acquainted them that he intended to summon one to sit on the third of November ensuing, and writs had accordingly been issued out for that purpose. There remained, therefore but a short time for him to return to London before the meeting of the parliament, which he did, leaving Strafford, who had joined his army, to provide for the peace of the North; and an army of rebels, whom he paid, to domineer in the bowels of his country; for it was understood that the Scottish army was neither to return, or be disbanded, till the treaty, begun at Rippon, was finished at London.

The parliament met, according to its summons, on the third of November, and the commons chose Lenthall, a lawyer of some reputation, for their speaker. The parliament at meeting was unusually numerous, every member looking upon this conjuncture as a national crisis: the speech of Charles, as usual contained reflections on the incredulity of those who had refused to trust to his personal assurances: he recommended to his parliament, first to drive out the Scottish rebels, and then he promised them a redress of grievances; and lastly he recommended to them to provide money for the payment of the army, which otherwise must be disbanded, while that of the rebels was kept on foot.

It would swell these sheets too much, were we minutely to set down the several steps taken by this parliament in the pursuit of the favourite object of humbling the kingly authority; we shall content ourselves with given a summary account of their proceedings, but so as not to omit any material incident worthy the knowledge of the reader. And here we shall beg leave to premise a general reflection on the characters and circumstances of men and things at this juncture.

The long intermission of parliaments had produced many mischiefs and inconveniences in the government, by the remissness of some and the rigor of others, in church and state, which inflamed the zeal of many good patriots of both houses to be very urgent for the redress of their errors: the eye of the whole nation was fixed on the proceedings of a parliament summoned at so critical a juncture, and during such general discontents as now rent the whole nation; a parliament which was to complete every thing left unfinished by former parliaments. Notwithstanding the vigorous efforts of the courtiers and ministers, the elections had run almost entirely in favour of those in the opposition: the members were generally bent upon an alteration in the government; the few moderate men amongst them sought only to ascertain the liberties of the nation; others resolved to humble the royal prerogative; and there was a more violent party that extended their views to an utter extirpation of the hierarchy and monarchical government, but these at first carefully concealed their designs under the profession of rigid presbyterianism, and were afterwards known by the name of Independents. The two latter parties were in confederacy with the Scots, and sought, by fomenting the distractions of the state, to lift themselves into places of power and trust: the pursuit of these things made them exceed the methods and proceedings of their predecessors, and, by inspiring jealousies, countenancing and procuring tumultuous petitions and assemblies by menaces and force, they often obtained the accomplishment of their purposes, contriving without-door in private meetings, what they designed to carry within. The success they met with in these their proceedings enlarged their views and extended their ambition; it bred thoughts in them they had never entertained before; and this was that which drew on the ruin of the king, and with him, for some time, the subversion of all monarchy: but many of those who were in the beginning most active for reformation, had not in their prospect the calamity that ensued, and too late repented the error of having lent their assistance to those actions, when they could no longer stem the tide that the breath of violence and disaffection had swelled to so great an height. These matters will more plainly appear as we proceed in the history of this reign, whose horrors we are now about to describe.

The earl of Strafford was considered as the first minister of state, both on account of the great interest which he had with his master, and his own uncommon abilities. By a concurrence of untoward circumstances he had exposed himself to the hatred of all the three nations, which composed the British empire. The Scots, whose authority was now very great, regarded him as the capital enemy of their country, and one, whose councils and influence they had most reason to dread. He had persuaded the parliament of Ireland to furnish large supplies, in order to prosecute a war against them: he had raised an army of nine thousand men, with which he threatened to invade their western coast: he had compelled the Scots, who lived under his government, to renounce the Covenant, which they so much adored: he had in Ireland denounced the Scottish Covenanters rebels and traitors, even before the king had taken any such step against them in England: and he had ever given his opinion against the late treaty and suspension of arms, which he considered as dangerous and dishonourable. So highly were the Scots incensed at all these measures, that they had absolutely refused to send commissioners to treat at York, as was first proposed; because, they said, the lieutenant of Ireland, their capital enemy, being general of the king's forces, was there possessed of the chief command and authority.

Strafford, first as deputy, then as lord-lieutenant, had managed the affairs of Ireland for the space of eight years. His government had been extremely vigilant and active, but very far from being popular. His authority and influence, however, during the time of his prosperity, had kept his enemies in awe; but no sooner was he seized with adversity, then the concealed aversion of the Irish blazed out at once, and the parliament of that kingdom employed every expedient in order to aggravate the charge against him.

All the grievances which the English had suffered for a number of years, were universally ascribed to the pernicious councils of Strafford; because he was known to be the minister whom the king most favoured and consulted.

Though descended from an ancient family, and born to a considerable estate, his sudden and great elevation was not exempted from envy; and his former associates in popular measures, finding that he owed his advancement to the desertion of their cause, pursued him with the most implacable hatred, and resolved to exert their utmost efforts in order to effect his ruin*.

The first five days of this session was taken up in settling the five standing committees for grievances, religion, courts of justice, trade, and privileges and elections; and in several declamatory speeches against the maladministration of government, both in church and state, the chief part of which were ascribed to the councils of the earl of Strafford and archbishop Laud: fanaticism seems to have taken possession of the minds of almost all ranks of people: at this time religion was become an universal fashion; the most eloquent speakers in the house introduced a kind of holy cant and jargon into their speeches, and all their allusions being scriptural, stamped them with an air of prophecy or inspiration.

The Scottish commissioners were now arrived in London, in order to put a finishing hand to the treaty that had been begun at Rippon. These had many conferences with their friends of the house of commons; and it was agreed by them, that the earl of Strafford should be impeached at his first coming to the house of peers, for he was as yet at York. This measure was thus suddenly resolved on, to prevent an impeachment that nobleman had ready against Mr. Pym and some others of the leading members of both houses, for holding intelligence with the Scots, which he intended to have offered in the house of peers as soon as he had taken his seat amongst them. It was the tenth of November, early in the morning, while the house of commons was in a debate about papists, that it was certainly known that Strafford was come to town; upon this a motion was immediately made, "that no member should leave the house; that the outward room, or lobby, be kept clear from strangers; and the outer door, upon the stair-head, be kept locked;" and all this upon pretext of examining Newton and Grey, two messengers, who had been concerned in taking up and discharging papists. This secrecy was somewhat interrupted by a message from the lords, who demanded a meeting with the commons, which the latter refused; and Pym and Clotworthy, with the other enemies of Strafford, were so vehement in their speeches, and so quick in their dispatch against him, that his impeachment, upon the notoriety of the facts contained in it, was carried up that very day by Pym, who at the bar of the house of peers accused him of high-treason. The earl was thereupon required to withdraw, and it was very warmly debated by the peers, whether he should be imprisoned on a general accusation as this was, without any particular act of treason charged against him; but, upon the question, it was carried in the affirmative, and the earl, upon being called in, was put into the custody of the black-rod, until the house of commons should exhibit a more particular charge against him.

The next day the commons, considering the great pressures of the northern counties by the two armies that lay upon them, resolved that two hundred thousand pounds should be raised for their maintenance; and, till it could be regularly levied, one hundred thousand pounds were borrowed in the city of London, upon the credit of some of the members of the house of commons. Many petitions from all parts were now brought in for redress of grievances, and to be relieved against orders and decrees of the Council-table, Star-chamber, and High-commission court; which were referred to the proper committees: several persons also were released out of prison upon their petitions, among whom were Prynne, Burton, and Bastwick: and a while after, by the intercession of the lords with the king, Williams, bishop of Lincoln, was also freed from his imprisonment in the Tower, and admitted to resume his seat in the upper-house. In the mean time the king, willing to be rid of the Scottish army, hastened the commission to the lords who were employed in the treaty of Rippon, or any ten of them, to treat with the Scottish commissioners, or any seven of them, to take into consideration their demands, and compose all differences arising thereupon; which commission was passed under the great-seal of England on the twenty-third of November: and in a short time after the Scots presented their demands, which were eight in number; and afterwards they put in seventeen heads, wherein one (and that not the least considerable) was, that some Scotchmen of respect might enjoy places of trust about the king, queen, and prince. This was that which all their pretences aimed at, notwithstanding all their zeal to the reformation of religion: and though all they desired else was granted, they never attained to their ends in this; for the troubles which they raised, did not only bring after them a misery to this nation, but them also, and the ringleaders of them wanted not their part thereof: sir Francis Windebank, secretary of state, was aimed at, as one of the great delinquents in the opinion of the parliament, being suspected in his religion, a great favourer of the priests of the Romish church, for whom he had obtained many reprieves, and was thought to be guilty of misdemeanors of a higher nature; but he, thinking himself not sufficiently provided to ride out the approaching storm, made his escape into France, where he died a Roman catholic. In the consideration of grievances, the charge imposed upon the subject for providing and furnishing of ships, and the assessments for raising money for that purpose, commonly called ship-money, were voted by both houses to be against the laws of the realm; and all proceedings in the case, both at Council-table, Star-chamber, and courts of justice, declared null and void.

The debate of ship-money led the house to consider of the first occasion of raising it, which was, because the parliament immediately preceeding the last, was dissolved without granting the supplies the king expected from them; and from hence they were led into an enquiry of several violations of the privileges of parliament, by the commitment of divers members, and a judgment against them in the King's Bench: and then all the inconveniences were summed up, that happened through the long intermission of parliaments; to provide against which, it was resolved to bring in a bill for establishing triennial parliaments. The debates took up many days, and whilst these consultations were held for the reformation of the civil state, the Scottish commissioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, were not idle in their endeavours to alter the hierarchy or ecclesiastical state: by the fanatical discourses of themselves and their emissaries they so worked upon the minds of the deluded people, that a great number of petitions were presented to the commons against ecclesiastical discipline, the ceremonies of the church, and the government of it by bishops: amongst which was one presented by alderman Pennington, subscribed by fifteen hundred citizens of London. This petition did not a little alarm the moderate party in the house of commons, who were not unwilling to have the abuses of church-government reformed, but could not approve of the alteration of that government itself; so that, after some debate, the petition was ordered to lie upon the table for farther consideration. The puritans however, though unsuccessful in this effort, fell a while after upon another expedient, more plausible, which was an inquisition into the legality of the new canons, the oath, and the tax upon the clergy, which had been created and imposed by the convocation, after the parliament had been dissolved, and it was voted by a great majority, "That such an assembly had no power to frame constitutions, canons, or any other acts, without consent of parliament; that the late canons contained matters contrary to the king's prerogative, the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the rights of parliament, and the liberty and property of the subjects; that therefore they tended to sedition, and were of the most dangerous consequences."

The very same day that the canons were thus voted down (December 17) the commons appointed a committee of thirty-nine members, to enquire who were the principal promoters of those canons, and to prepare an impeachment against the archbishop of Canterbury, for having endeavoured to overturn the laws and religion of his country. The Scottish commissioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, at the same time presented to the lords an accusation against that prelate, charging him with being the author of all the troubles in Scotland, by imposing the book of canons and the liturgy upon the natives of that kingdom, and exciting a war between his majesty and his subjects. The archbishop being likewise impeached by the commons, was taken into custody, and afterwards committed to the Tower. Matthew Wren, bishop of Ely, being suspected of a design to quit the kingdom, was obliged to give security for ten thousand pounds. The lord-keeper Finch being threatened with a prosecution, fled into Holland and was declared a traitor by a vote of the house of commons, and the king committed the seals to the custody of sir Edward Littleton. Brampton, Davenport, and Crawley, three of the judges, were obliged to give bail. Such was the method taken to overawe the king's ministers: but what still more contributed to intimidate his adherents, was the practice of passing votes against any part of their conduct as contrary to law. From want of power, rather than inclination, to resist, the king was obliged to remain a passive spectator of all those violent proceedings. He hoped to regain his lost authority by a little flexibility, but herein he was mistaken: he imagined that the parliament would assist him in taking vengeance upon the Scots for their irruption into England; but instead of that, this very parliament made them a present of three hundred thousand pounds, to defray the expences they had been at in carrying on a civil war. He flattered himself likewise with suppressing the puritanical party in England: almost all the members of the house of commons were puritans. He had a tender affection for the earl of Strafford, who had devoted himself so generously to his service; and the commons soon after obliged him to sign the fatal warrant for his death, and thereby shew his subjects the way to shed blood still more precious.

We have already observed, that the States had proposed to Charles a marriage between his eldest daughter and the young prince of Orange. In the beginning of the year 1641, this prince renewed the demand, and the ambassadors had orders to propose to Charles, at the same time such a league as should be found most conducive to the interests of both people. Charles readily agreed to both propositions, and the articles of marriage were soon drawn up; but he thought proper to impart the whole to the house of peers, which he accordingly did, and the marriage was shortly after concluded, to the great satisfaction of the public.

About this time, or a few days before, the particular charge against the earl of Strafford was carried up to the lords by Mr. Pym, under twenty-eight articles. They had, on the twenty-eighth of November, in the preceding year, exhibited some general articles, to which he could not be forced to answer; but upon this farther impeachment the lords required him to answer to the whole: and though the charge was very long, yet were the commons so pressing for his answer, that, by the twenty-fourth of February, he delivered it to the lords. It appears that the Irish house of commons had by this time sent over a committee to assist in the prosecution of this unfortunate nobleman, who had been their governor; and, in a word, the three kingdoms seemed bent upon his destruction. Upon the carrying up the impeachment last-mentioned, he was taken out of the custody of the usher of the black-rod, and committed to the Tower. He moved the lords to have counsel allowed him, which was much opposed by the commons; but his accusation being found to have many points of law in it, he was at length indulged with a grant of his request.

The bill for triennial parliaments having passed both houses, was, on the sixteenth of February, offered to the king, under the title of "An act for the preventing inconveniencies happening from the long intermission of parliaments," and at the same time the commons presented an act for the relief of his majesty's army and the northern parts of the kingdom, to both which the king gave his royal assent. No act that had ever passed seemed better calculated for preserving the liberties of the subject, than the act for triennial parliaments; for it it provided, "that in case the king should refuse to summon a parliament at the time therein limited, the chancellor or keeper might issue out writs to summon the peers, and for election of the commons; and if the chancellor or keeper should not do it, any twelve of the peers might summon the parliament; and if the peers should omit the issuing out of summons, the sheriffs in counties, and other magistrates, respectively, might cause elections to be made; and if the sheriffs should refuse, the freeholders in the counties might make elections of members; and the members so chosen were, under great penalties, obliged to attend:" with many other clauses to accomplish the end designed by the act.

It must be confessed, that this act had in it several expressions too much reflecting upon the prerogative; but Charles seems by this time to have been sensible of the many mischiefs arising from the too long intermission of parliaments, and seems to have resolved to communicate more freely and frequently in that way with his subjects. In a word, his so readily giving his assent to this act was highly pleasing to the people in general, who every where expressed their satisfaction by bonfires and other rejoicings: both houses also waited upon the king at Whitehall, with an address of thanks on the occasion. On the same day these bills were signed, the charge against the archbishop of Canterbury was carried up to the lords by sir Henry Vane, the younger, whereupon Laud was ordered to be sent to the Tower; but, upon his humble suit to the lords, his commitment was respited to the first of March.

The Scottish commissioners were all this while exerting their utmost endeavours for the overthrow of the hierarchy, and the introduction of their presbyterian discipline into the church of England, and had, by their confederates, made an active party in the house of commons, which was almost filled with puritans, who took every occasion of aspersing the bishops, and in their speeches spared not the episcopal order itself. The city petition, already mentioned, was now taken a second time into consideration, and, in the course of the debates, several motions were made for entirely abolishing the order of bishops: among those who argued for this measure, none distinguished themselves with so much vehement eloquence as Nathaniel Fiennes, the younger son of the lord Say and Seale; but the lord Falkland, the lord Digby, and many other noblemen of consummate integrity and deep erudition, so warmly opposed the motion, and by the strength and eloquence of their reasoning, so far prevailed, that the order of episcopacy was yet preserved, though its power was much lessened by a vote passed in the house of commons, preparatory to a bill, resolving, "that no bishop shall have any vote in parliament, or any judicial power in the Star-chamber, nor bear any sway in temporal affairs; and that no clergyman shall be in the commission of the peace."

About this time Charles, who seems to have had nothing else in view but the restoring the confidence of his subjects, by endeavouring to satisfy his parliament and smooth his measures, agreed to several considerable alterations in his court: he admitted into his council the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Essex, Bristol, and Warwick, the lords Say, Saville, and Kimbolton; Juxon, bishop of London, had, with less envy than could be expected, for some years held the treasurer's staff, but he now resigned it. Oliver St. John was appointed solicitor-general: the king intended that Denzill Holles should have filled the places of secretary of state, vacated by the flight of Windebank; that Pym should be made chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of the lord Cottington, who resigned for that purpose; lord Say, master of the wards; the earl of Essex governor, and Mr. Hampden tutor, to the prince of Wales: but the marquis of Hamilton, who had a great esteem for Strafford, whom Charles ardently wished to have preserved, persuaded the king that the delaying these promotions would be a strong bait in Strafford's favour, or that it was necessary to make some previous terms before the vacancies were filled up, for securing his life. This advice was fatally followed, and blasted the whole scheme: thus Charles lost the opportunity of at least making the opposition easy, by those popular acts, for that time, if not for ever.

The sops with-held from the Cerberusses of the party, and the sacrifices Charles had already made, did not one moment retard the prosecution of Strafford. That nobleman was considered as the chief support of the prerogative; the commons looked upon him as an apostate; the Scots, as the implacable and avowed enemy of their country. On the thirtieth of January, twenty-eight fresh articles had been given in against the earl, the particulars of which are foreign to a general history; it is sufficient to say, that they charged him with having exercised illegal power and oppressions in many instances, both as president of the North and as lord lieutenant of Ireland; with having been the cause of the war with the Scots (whom the commons had lately ordered to be styled on all occasions "our brethren of Scotland"), against whom he had unjustly irritated his majesty; with having levied an army of Irish papists to enslave the kingdom; and with having advised the king to establish an absolute government on the ruin of the constitution.

Westminster-hall was formed into a large court of judicature for the important trial; the earl of Arundel presided as high-steward, the peers sat in their robes as judges, the commons appeared as accusers, on which account it was determined that the impeachment should be managed by commoners: these were George lord Digby, (an Irish peer), John Hampden, esq. John Pym, esq. Oliver St. John, esq. sir Walter Erle, knight, Geoffrey Palmer, esq. John Maynard, esq. and John Glynn, esq. Whitlock was appointed chairman of this committee: we must not forget that the bishops declined being present, agreeable to the canon law, which forbids their assisting at any trial for life: at the upper end of the hall was a chair and cloth of state for the king, and on each side a close gallery, in which his majesty and the queen sat in private. The trial began on the twenty-second of March: the articles of accusation were enforced with all the virulence of malice. The earl behaved with great dignity, courage, and composure; his defence was noble, spirited, and effectual; he acquitted himself of every accusation, except a few acrimonious expressions, and some instances of indiscretion, which ought to have been forgiven, as the infirmities of human nature. Nothing had appeared against him to justify the charge of treason, when, on the twelfth of April, Pym produced in the house of commons a paper of some notes taken by secretary Vane, of opinions delivered at the council-table. Young Vane pretended he had found them by accident in his father's cabinet; and, as they were thought to bear testimony against the earl, his accusers the next day read them openly at his trial. They were entitled "No danger of a war with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive." The earl had advised the king to borrow a sum of money: he said his majesty was absolved by all rules of government, as having tried all legal ways, and been repulsed; and that he had an army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience. The earl, in his defence, observed "that it was hard measure to be prosecuted, under the notion of treason, for opinions given in council: that his using the expression 'this kingdom' was not proved; as the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Northumberland, the lord-treasurer, and the lord Cottington, who were present at the board, declared upon their honours that they never heard him speak such words. But, granting he had used the expression, the word this could not rationally imply England, which had not been guilty of disobedience; but Scotland, which was the immediate object of their deliberation, and in a state of actual rebellion." After making this answer, he re-capitulated the several parts of his former defence, and in his conclusion said, "My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges a saint in heaven hath left me." Here he made a pause, pointing to his children and shedding some tears: then proceeded in these words; "What I forfeit myself, is nothing; but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity, woundeth me to the very soul.—You will pardon my infirmity: something I should have added, but am not able, so therefore let it pass.—And now, my lords, for myself; I have been taught, by the blessings of the Almighty God, that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which will be revealed hereafter; and so, my lords, even so, with all tranquility of mind I freely submit myself to your judgment; be it life or death, Te Deum laudamus." The very chairman of the committee says, this great and good person spoke with such pathetic grace and eloquence as moved the hearts of all his auditors (a few excepted) to pity and remorse.

The accusation and defence lasted eighteen days: Strafford, in his replies was obliged to reserve a seeming respect for his most implacable enemies, the Scottish nation and the Irish parliament. He took only a short time to answer each article urged against him, yet he made such a noble and satisfactory defence, that the commons saw it impossible, by a legal prosecution, ever to attain their purpose against him. But the death of Strafford was considered as a matter of too great importance to be left unaccomplished. A bill of attainder was therefore introduced into the lower-house immediately after the conclusion of this pleadings, which passed the house on the twenty-first of April, after very warm debates, fifty-nine votes only dissenting, and was immediately sent up to the lords. On the first of May the king went to the house of peers, and, in a speech, earnestly requested both houses that they would not proceed severely against the earl of Strafford, whom, in his own conscience, he said, he could not condemn of high-treason; but declared at the same time, that, for his misdemeanors, he should never serve him or the kingdom in any place of trust, "no not so much as a constable."

This speech was highly offensive to those who thirsted for the blood of this nobleman; and they were so hot in the pursuit of their designs, that the commons voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the house. At the same time they employed their emissaries without doors to spread about the city, and other parts of the town, papers containing the names of the fifty-nine members who voted against the bill of attainder: those names were affixed to public places, under the denomination of Straffordians and betrayers of their country, and thus exposed to the fury of the ungoverned multitude, made at this time so mad and violent, that, on the third of May, vast numbers from the city appeared at Westminster, armed with swords and cudgels, crying aloud for justice against the earl of Strafford; and such as were suspected of attachment to that unfortunate nobleman, were afraid to appear in public. About eighty peers had constantly been present at Strafford's trial, but so much were they intimidated by the popular tumults, that only forty-nine were in the house of lords when the bill of attainder was introduced; yet even nineteen of these had the courage to vote against it: a strong presumption that, had liberty of debate been allowed, the bill would have been rejected by a great majority. A new discovery, made about this time, increased still farther the fury of the people, and hastened the fate of the devoted Strafford: some principal officers of the king's army, partly from their attachment to the crown, and partly from an aversion to the parliament, had formed a plan for engaging into the king's service the troops under their command; with this view they entered into an association, bound themselves by an oath of secrecy, and maintained a close correspondence with the king's servants: the form of a petition to the king and parliament was composed, and it was resolved to procure the subscription of the army to this petition, in which, after representing the great danger to which the ancient constitution of the kingdom was subject, by the insolent proceedings of certain factious and turbulent spirits, the army offered to come up and protect his majesty and the parliament, "so shall the nation (as they allege in conclusion) not only be vindicated from present innovations, but be secured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to be more pernicious than the former." The draught of this petition was transmitted to the king, who unhappily was persuaded to countersign it, as a mark of his approbation. One of the parties concerned (Goring), imagining the affair could not be kept long a secret, discovered the whole to the lords Newport and Dungarvon, and they to Pym, who instantly imparted the matter to the house. This discovery could not fail to excite the most violent indignation among the people. It was now given out that there was a wicked concert, a most dreadful plot, between the court and the army, to cut the throats of the parliament, and of all those who stood up for their liberties. The puritanical faction among the commons naturally improved this singular advantage: they instantly got the house to vote, that a protestation should be signed by all the members, to maintain the protestant religion against popery, to defend the king's person, the power of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subject; and the commons, by their sole authority, issued orders that it should be subscribed by the whole nation.

It is incredible with what alacrity this protestation was taken, and what a spirit it raised against the earl of Strafford. A bill was next brought in for continuing this parliament, which should not be prorogued, adjourned, or dissolved without the consent of both houses, until the grievances should be redressed; but have credit to take up money. There can be no doubt, that by this bill the parliament dissolved the constitution, and henceforward are with justice to be considered as a faction against the commonwealth. The same day (Friday May 5), the commons sent to the king, desiring access to him, which was granted; and, about four o'clock, they attended in the Banqueting-house, at Whitehall, where they presented to him the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford, and that for the continuance of the parliament, with an intimation that the present state of the kingdom would not admit of delay; and therefore they humbly besought him to give the royal assent to those bills: the king told them they might expect his answer on Monday, and so dismissed them.

Where ever the king turned his eyes he saw no remedy nor relief: his case, it is certain, called aloud for pity; he was racked with the pangs of conscience, about putting to death a minister whom he had esteemed, and whom he believed to be innocent; not a counsellor about him, Juxon excepted, had the courage to speak their mind, and all concurred in maintaining (a most manifest falsehood) that the king ought to satisfy his people in this demand, which would, it was presumed, finally content them. The good bishop, with a virtuous resolution, becoming the sacred character he bore, advised the king, if in his conscience he thought the bill unjust, by no means to give his assent to it. Strafford, informed of the extreme peplexity his royal master was in, carried his loyalty to such a height as to write a letter to the king exhorting him to consent to his death. "In this (said he) my consent will more acquit your majesty to God, than all the world can do besides. To a willing mind there is no injury. And as, by God's grace, I freely forgive all the world, with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my departing soul; so, sir, to you, I can resign the life of this world with the utmost cheerfulness, in the just sense of your many, great, and exceeding favours." Charles had the weakness to take this trusty servant at his word, and he assented to pass the act, though he thought he was doing what merited eternal reproach here, and the vengeance of a just God hereafter; for it appeared that Charles, notwithstanding his passing the bill, had violent pangs about Strafford, since we find that, on the tenth of May, he sent the prince of Wales to the house of peers with a letter, in which he enjoined them to interpose their good offices with the commons, in order to procure a mitigation of Strafford's sentence, or at least a short delay; but, to the indelible disgrace of loyalty, humanity, and every social or religious virtue; both his requests were flatly refused: could he, indeed, expect any other from the spirit of that opposition? A committee of twelve lords was appointed to satisfy the king, that even a delay of this illustrious criminal's execution would endanger his own and his family's safety; and Charles, with a reluctance to be felt but not described, yielded to the necessity of the juncture, and it was resolved that the earl should die on the twelfth of May.

He was assisted in his last moments by archbishop Usher, but was barbarously denied the comfort of speaking with Laud; and on the day appointed was brought to Tower-hill, where his head was cut off. It is hard to say whether he shewed himself more pious or brave in his death, or whether he was more blameable or laudable in his life; but it is certain, that, however great his personal failings or political demerits were, the abilities and virtues he possessed, with the penalty of his head which he paid, ought to claim the pity of impartial posterity for his fate, which, to his dying day, sat heavy upon his royal master. Even a few weeks after Strafford's execution, this very parliament, as if conscious of the iniquity, at least illegality, of his sentence, passed an act for restoring his children in blood and honour, and invested them with the possessions of their father's estates.

The commons having thus, by the death of the earl of Strafford, removed the grand obstacle, as they imagined, to their intended reformation of the state, proceeded to prosecute their projected plan with the utmost industry and vigour. All the taxes which the king had imposed, the Star-chamber and High-commission court, the extension of the forests, and the practice of imprisoning those who refused to comply with such impositions, were voted contrary to law, and the greater part of monopolies suppressed. The judges had hitherto enjoyed their patents only during his majesty's pleasure; the commons now petitioned the king to grant them patents during their good behaviour: and Charles was persuaded to comply with their request. The marshal's-court, which took cognizance of offensive words, and was extremely arbitrary in its proceedings, was for that reason, suppressed. The stannary courts, which exercised jurisdiction over the miners of Cornwall, being liable to a like objection, underwent the like fate. The council in the North, and that of Wales, were both abolished on the same principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, who had a right to inspect all the weights and measures throughout the kingdom, was transferred to the mayor, sheriffs, and ordinary magistrates. In a word, if we examine the proceedings of this memorable parliament during the first period of its operations, we shall find that we are indebted to it for many valuable liberties we enjoy at this day.

The treaty with the Scots being brought to a conclusion, Charles allowed the parliament of Scotland to assemble, and declared his intention of assisting at it in person. The commons, suspecting that he designed to put himself at the head of his army in the North, on pretence of his visiting his kingdom of Scotland, demanded a conference with the lords, and proposed that both armies should be disbanded before his departure, which the king at their request, postponed till the tenth of August,

Both.

Both were accordingly disbanded at the same time, and the Scots returned to their own country, very well satisfied with their expedition. Then the king set out on his journey; but their distrust still subsisting, the parliament proposed that a committee from both houses should attend the king in Scotland, on pretence of conferring with the Scottish parliament, though in reality to be spies upon his majesty's conduct. The earl of Bedford being nominated as one of the peers, declined the office, so that lord Howard of Escrick was the only member of that house who undertook the journey; and of the commons the committee consisted of Nathaniel Fiennes, sir William Armye, sir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden. The commons still continued sitting, and took several grievances into consideration; then they resolved to adjourn from the ninth of September to the twentieth of October. This resolution was no sooner taken, than a great number of members from both houses retired to the country; and some rigid presbyterians took this opportunity to propose an alteration in the Book of Common Prayer, which was so vigorously defended by Mr. Hyde (afterwards earl of Clarendon), that no step was taken on the subject. The lords, during this dispute, voted that the Common Prayer should be used without any alteration. This vote produced a conference between the houses: the commons desired the lords would concur with them in publishing a declaration for suppressing all the late innovations in the church, and all diversions on the Lord's Day. The lords, on the other hand, demanded the concurrence of the commons in publishing an order of their house, prohibiting all change in divine worship as established by law: the lower-house absolutely rejected this proposal, and ordered their declaration to be printed and published through the whole kingdom; they at the same time appointed a committee of forty-three members to manage affairs of importance during their adjournment; the lords established another for their house, and then the parliament adjourned to the twentieth of October.

The king, attended by the duke of Lenox, lately honoured with the additional title of duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and lord Willoughby, set out for Scotland on the tenth of August. On his arrival at Edinburgh, he was received there with great demonstrations of affection by the people; and, in return for this reception, he confirmed not only the articles of the treaty between the two nations by act of parliament, but all his former concessions also, and all such things as had been transacted by them in their general assemblies; and likewise, the more effectually to gain their esteem, he conferred titles of honour and dignity on some, and places of power, trust, and profit, on others; amongst these the marquis of Hamilton was created duke of Hamilton; and general Lesly was created earl of Leven, who was so transported with the sense of the king's favour and bounty to him, that he often protested, and once, at Perth, upon his knees, in the house of the earl of Kinnoul, that he would never bear arms against the king.

A while after, some information was given to the marquisses of Hamilton and Argyll, that there was some design upon their persons, which made them for some few days withdraw themselves from the parliament and retire from Edinburgh: but their persons were of such quality and estimation in Scotland, that great pains were taken to discover the grounds thereof; and, after full examination by the parliament, they themselves and the great council were satisfied, that the information given to them could not be made good to the proof of any design against their persons; but the king, who was a little reflected upon in the first information, could not conceal his resentment of this carriage in Hamilton; and when he delivered his patent to the duke in parliament (according to the custom of that nation), he told him he had not deserved to be mistrusted by him, for he knew well, when he was accused to him of high-treason, he permitted him even to be in his bed-chamber. This reproof made no great impression upon the new duke, though he seemed outwardly much troubled for having given the king so just a cause of displeasure; yet, upon the first report of the business at London (without staying to hear the opinion of the parliament of Scotland, who had fully examined it) strange interpretations were made upon the matter, as highly and nearly concerning the peace of England; and a sudden resolution was taken, first by the committee during the recess, and after by the parliament, to have a guard for the defence of London and Westminster; and both houses of parliament instilled fresh apprehensions of danger into the minds of the people, when they were so lately freed from the fears of two armies.

While Charles resided in Scotland, he employed all his time and endeavours to compose the troubles of that kingdom; and he was now preparing to return to England, in order to perfect the same salutary work here, when he received intelligence of a rebellion which had broke out in Ireland. The catholics of that country thought they had found the fairest opportunity of shaking off the English yoke; and religion and liberty, those two sources of the greatest actions, hurried them into a design the most cruel history hath recorded. They plotted to rise throughout all the provinces in one day, and murder every protestant in the kingdom, after having surprized the castle of Dublin, which, though the grand magazine of the kingdom, and a place of such importance, was provided with no more than fifty men for its garrison. The execution of this scheme was delayed till the approach of winter, that there might be greater difficulty of transporting troops from England. Cardinal Richelieu had promised the conspirators a considerable supply of men and money, and many Irish officers had given assurance that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren as soon as an insurrection should be raised. The design upon the castle of Dublin, which was to have been put in execution the twenty-third of October, was prevented by a timely discovery of the plot to the two lord-justices, the very night only before; and thus the capital was preserved; but the bloody part of the conspiracy was past prevention, for the conspirators were in arms the day affixed in all the counties of the kingdom, and actually massacred upwards of forty thousand defenceless protestants. It would shock the feelings of humanity to describe the particulars of this bloody tragedy; it may suffice to say, that death was the slightest punishment which those bigoted and blood-thirsty catholics inflicted upon the unhappy protestant victims.

Charles

Charles received intelligence of this insurrection by a messenger dispatched from the North of Ireland. He forthwith imparted the matter to the Scottish parliament, and demanded immediate succours for the suppression of the rebels, but the Scots referred the business to the English parliament, alleging, with justice, that Ireland depended upon England, who would undoubtedly provide for its security. The king therefore returned in haste to London, where, to his infinite mortification, he found that the Irish catholics, in excuse for this barbarous massacre, pretended to have received a commission from the king himself to take up arms; and thus Charles, who was soliciting assistance against them, both from his English and Scottish subjects, saw himself accused of the crime he was endeavouring to punish. The frenzy of the Irish gave their enemies infinite advantage: had they applied to Charles for relief from their grievances, had they drawn the sword in the just defence of those natural liberties, which no difference between papists and protestants ought to affect, and had they not at once rushed into barbarities which no provocation can justify, Charles might have found an asylum in them, and they a protector in him: for though I am as strongly convinced as any the most zealous partizans of that monarch's memory, that he detested the massacre of innocents that had been committed, yet I am entirely satisfied that he did not at all in his heart disapprove of their taking up arms upon the principles they professed: if they could have submitted to have been directed by him, I am farther of opinion, that, had they not put off the characters of men, he would have thought a public indulgence in matters either of religion or liberty, much safer with a papist than a puritan or presbyterian.

The king arrived in London on the twenty-fifth of November. The house of commons thinking, or at least pretending to think, that he was concerned in the Irish rebellion, sent but very slender supplies of men and money to that kingdom; and at the same time resuming the dispositions in which they had parted, they discovered in every vote their determined resolution to extend their own authority, and to abridge the power of the sovereign; and this they thought could not be so effectually brought about as by exasperating the people against the government. With this view, a few days after his arrival from Scotland, they presented to him at Hampton-court, that remonstrance which has made so much noise, and which was soon after productive of the most important consequences: it was not addressed to the king, but was plainly declared to be an appeal to the people; and the severity of the matter was exceeded only by the acrimony of the style. It was, indeed, a recapitulation of all the wrong measures and provoking steps that Charles had committed ever since the commencement of his reign, for which he had so severely atoned by the concessions he made, and the mortifications he had undergone. Amongst other things, they pointed strongly against the popish lords and the English prelates in the house of peers, to whom they attributed all the difficulties they met with from the peers in their measures. In conclusion, they petitioned the king for farther restraints and punishments upon the papists and their favourers; and they told him plainly, that unless he made use of such ministers, both at home and abroad, as they could confide in, they would give him no support: they even let his majesty know, that he was to guess at their meaning, though they neither named nor impeached persons; and that it was enough to disqualify any man for his service if they distrusted him, or if he had ever been known to defend or countenance those who had been questioned in parliament.

Had all the oppressions complained of here still continued under Charles, this remonstrance had been the bravest and wisest measure that any parliament ever pursued, and must have done immortal honour to its framers; but as all those grievances had been already redressed; as the land-marks of the constitution had now been refixed; as Charles had been as liberal in granting, as his subjects had been importunate in asking: all this, I say, being the case, what can any unprejudiced person imagine the true end of this remonstrance to be? The answer is obvious! No wonder, therefore, that an appeal of such an invidious and malignant nature, should meet with a strong opposition in the house of commons, where it passed by a majority of only eleven, viz. one hundred and fifty-nine against one hundred and forty-eight. Indeed it was easy to see that the road must now divide, and that the well and the ill intentioned could no longer journey together. The proceedings of the opposition were very distasteful to many of their own friends in the house, who began more and more to mistrust their intentions. Mr. Capel, member for Hertfordshire, a person of great integrity and authority in parliament, had been very warm in the opposition, and had been as forward as any gentleman in the house for removing the real grievances of his country: the like may be said of the lords Falkland and Digby, sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others, whose concurrence against the court had given vast credit to the opposition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and perhaps farther than in duty, they could require, and that opposition ought to cease. They made no secret of these sentiments, and Mr. Capel had been called up to the house of peers; treaties were likewise on foot with many other noblemen and gentlemen, who were quite wearied out by the incroachments of the faction, but none had yet the courage, the lord Digby excepted, to break with the faction in the house of commons. It is said that Oliver Cromwell, who was at this time a member of the house, declared, that if the remonstrance did not pass, he would sell the little estate he had, and retire from England. I take notice of this speech, only to prove that this extraordinary man was then an enthusiast for that liberty which his ambition afterwards trampled upon.

When this remonstrance was presented to Charles, he received it with some impatience, but with great politeness and civility. It is remarkable, that it was carried to the king by sir Ralph Hopton, who became afterwards so great a convert to his cause. But the faction thought they could not completely effect their ends, unless they could have the bishops out of the upper-house: they easily stirred up the populace to their purpose, who filled the whole city with sedition, and, assembling in great multitudes before the house of lords, exclaimed "No bishops! no bishops!" Twelve prelates, lates, intimidated by those riotous proceedings, resolved to retire, after subscribing a protest against all laws, votes, and resolutions which should be made in their absence. The lords, upon receiving this protest, committed them to the Tower; upon which the rest of the bishops afterwards withdrew from the house. The tumults about Whitehall became every day more violent and outrageous, in so much that the royal person itself seemed in danger from the mad licentiousness of the mob. In this scene of anarchy and confusion, some reduced officers, and gentlemen of the inns of court, offered their service to his majesty. Between them and the rabble there happened frequent skirmishes, which were sometimes attended with bloodshed. By way of reproach, these gentlemen stigmatized the rabble with the appellation of Roundheads, on account of the short, cropt hair, which they wore; and these, in return, gave the others the name of Cavaliers: and thus the nation, which was before sufficiently exasperated, as well by civil as religious quarrels, was likewise provided with party-names, under which the opposite leaders might range their adherents, and signalize their mutual hatred and resentment. The countenance which Charles gave to the disbanded officers to oppose the insults of the mob, proved a fatal measure to him, as it gave the commons an handle for publicly encouraging the tumults, and for making a formal demand to the king for a guard, commanded by the earl of Essex, to be set over the parliament. The king refusing the demand of a guard, they appointed a committee to sit at Guildhall, the center of the factious rout that now protected them. A few days afterwards the king committed another indiscretion, which was attended with more fatal and dangerous consequences; an indiscretion which, if it did not absolutely cause, at least greatly, accelerated all the disorders and civil wars in which the kingdom was soon after involved. Lord Digby, a man of great abilities, but of a warm and passionate disposition, shocked at the growing insolence of the opposition, represented to Charles, that if he exerted the authority, and displayed the majesty of a monarch, his insolent subjects would instantly shrink before him: the queen, and some of the courtiers, enforced this topic; and Charles, who, though commonly moderate in his temper, was ever indeed too hasty, and had moreover lately received insults, that no private gentleman, much less so great a prince, could well bear with patience, at last yielded to the fatal importunity of his friends and servants. He was encouraged to think that he could give the last blow to the popularity of the faction by producing evidences of their inviting the Scots to invade England; accordingly, on the third of January, 1642, Herbert, attorney-general, at the clerk's table in the house of peers, presented the following articles of high-treason against the lord Kimbolton and five commoners (the most active of those in the opposition), Mr. Denzil Holles, sir Arthur Haslerigg, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode. The articles exhibited against them were these:

"I. That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the kingdom of England; to deprive the king of his royal power, and to place in the subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his majesty's liege people.

"II. That they have traitorously endeavoured, by many foul assertions upon his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious to them.

"III. That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his majesty's command, and to side with them in their traitorous designs.

"IV. That they have traitorously invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England.

"V. That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the rights and very being of parliaments.

"VI. That for completing of their traitorous designs, they have endeavoured, so far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs; and to that end have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament.

"VII. And that they have traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied war against the king."

The king seconded this attack, by another still more rash and inconsiderate: a serjeant at arms repaired to the house of commons, and demanded, in the king's name, the five impeached members; but he was dismissed without any positive answer: messengers were ordered to search for, and apprehend them; their trunks, chambers, and lodgings were sealed and locked. The house declared all these proceedings to be a breach of privilege; and enjoined every one to defend the liberty of the members. The lords concurred with the commons in these resolutions. Charles, stung with the united intention of the two houses, did the most unadvised thing that, perhaps, had ever been done by a king of England; he determined to support what he had begun, by one vigorous stroke of authority: unhappily, he forgot that this was a conjuncture in which he ought not to expose that authority to any new affront. He went the next day, attended by his ordinary retinue, consisting of about two hundred persons, armed as usual, some with halberts, others with small arms; and, leaving them at the door, advanced alone through the hall, while all the members stood up to receive him; and seating himself in the speaker's chair, he, in a speech he made to the house, insisted upon their delivering up the five members he had impeached; but looking round, and not seeing the accused persons, who had previously withdrawn themselves, he concluded his speech with telling the house, that since the birds were flown, he expected, as soon as they did come to the house, they should be sent to him, "otherwise, said he, I must tell you, that I shall take my own courses to find them."

It is impossible to describe the fury into which this act of Charles threw the house; the roof resounded with the cry of, Privilege! Privilege! Charles, like a bewildered person, who knows not whither to turn himself, went that same afternoon to Guildhall, in order to demand assistance of the city: the common-council, instead of complying with his desire, the next day presented a remonstrance against himself. On the eighth of January a new committee was appointed to sit at Guildhall; and this, perhaps, was the most masterly stroke of the party, because it increased the panic of the public, as if the members were not safe without the

the city. This committee, in which all who should come were to have voices, made strict scrutiny into every circumstance attending the king's entrance into the house: every passionate expression, every menacing look and gesture of any, even the meanest, of his attendants, was represented in the blackest and most odious colours; and an intention was thence inferred of offering violence to the parliament, of arresting the impeached members in the very house, and of murdering all those who should make any resistance; and they immediately produced a paper to be voted, as it was by the whole house, declaring the late act of the king to be "an high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament; and that the house cannot, with safety to their own persons, or regard to the said rights and privileges, continue to sit there any longer, without full satisfaction being made to them for this insult." Public directions were at the same time given for drawing down the trainbands of the city to Westminster on the second of January, to guard and bring in triumph the persons of the accused members (who had taken shelter in the city), as such worthy patriots that the commonwealth, at present, could not subsist independent of them.

The king being informed of these proceedings, and thinking his wife's, his children's, and his own life, in danger from the enraged multitude, took the fatal resolution of removing from Whitehall to Hampton-court, with his queen and family, which he did on the afternoon of Monday the tenth of January; and now, become sensible of the extreme folly of his late conduct, and dreading the farther effects of popular resentment, he endeavoured, if possible, to repair his errors, and to atone for the wrong step he had taken, and which he found himself incapable of supporting. He accordingly sent a message to the commons on Wednesday the twelfth of January, giving them to understand, "That he desisted from his prosecution of the five members, and that he would be as careful of the privileges of parliament as of his life or crown." He likewise, on the twentieth following, sent another message to parliament, desiring them "to digest into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to send them to him, promising his favourable assent to those means which should be found most effectual for redress; wherein he would not only equal, but exceed the most indulgent prince." There surely cannot, with any man of candour or common sense, remain the least doubt that these concessions were more than sufficient to have quieted the apprehensions of men whose inclinations were peaceable; but, unhappily, Charles had, by the violence of his former conduct, rendered himself odious to his parliament, and his present concession made them despise him.

The commons began now to take the whole management of the kingdom into their own hands; they ordered the governors of Hull and Portsmouth, to admit no man into those towns or forts, without an order signed by the parliament; they assumed the regal power of disposing the militia, and trained-bands of the city of London, and even to name lord-lieutenants for the several counties, nay, so much as the captains that were appointed to command the ships of war. During this confusion, the rebellion in Ireland triumphed over the weak opposition which had been made to it; and the insurgents, reeking with the blood of their countrymen, carried on their barbarities under the king's name, and that of the queen his consort, especially the latter, as she was a catholic. Both houses now proposed to raise the militia, but, at the same time, insisted that it should be commanded by such officers only as they should nominate. Charles was now come from Hampton court to Greenwich, where the earls of Pembroke and Holland waited on him with a thundering declaration of the parliament, which consisted of a preamble of the cause of the present distractions, and the remedies for them, and in which they treated the king with their usual insolence. This declaration was delivered to him on the fifteenth of March; and the next day he delivered his full answer, in which he endeavoured to exculpate himself of the charge urged against him, and concluded with the following pathetic expression: "God so deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright for the maintenance of the true protestant religion, and for the observation and preservation of the laws of this land; and I hope God will bless and assert these laws for my preservation."

The two earls, upon the king's delivering his answer, renewed their request, but all in vain, that he should come nearer his parliament; and the earl of Pembroke pressed him to grant the militia, as was desired by the parliament, for a time. "By God (replied Charles), not for an hour: you have asked that of me, in this, which was never asked of any king; and with which, I would not trust my wife and children." Charles then reproached the parliament for their conduct in the affairs of Ireland, and said that "had he been trusted with the management of them, he would have pawned his head to have finished that work; and though I am a beggar myself, concluded he, I can find money for that."

In the foregoing month of February, Charles's queen, Henrietta of France, daughter to Henry IV. had gone over to Holland, on pretence of accompanying her daughter, the princess Mary, to the prince of Orange, her husband; but, in reality, to solicit succours from that state, in case of emergency; as it was pretty evident, from the proceedings on both sides, that the appeal must soon be made to arms: she negotiated likewise at the northern courts; in a word, she sought every where for assistance, except in her own country, where cardinal Richelieu, her avowed enemy, and the king, her brother, were both dying. But to return.

Charles, now that he apprehended nothing from his queen, answered the numerous declarations, messages, and the like, that he was plied with from the parliament, with a spirit that drove the two houses into new perplexities; and having sent for the prince of Wales and the duke of York to come to him, he set out for York, which he was resolved for some time to make the place of his residence, till the tumults in his capital were somewhat subsided. Hither the principal nobility and gentry repaired from all quarters of England, to pay their respects to their sovereign, and to promise him their aid and assistance. As some ill meaning or ill informed historians of those times have, with an air of confidence, asserted, that all the people of the kingdom were enemies to the king, except some officers of the army, the bishops, the catholics, and those who had been engaged in the Gunpowder-plot, we think it necessary to refute the calumny, by enumerating the principal persons who attended Charles at York, and declared in his favour: these were, lord Littleton, keeper of the seals, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Devonshire, Clare, Monmouth, Caernarvon, Cumberland, Salisbury, Cambridge, Westmoreland, Rivers, Newport, Lindsey, Bath, Dorset, Northampton, Bristol, Berkshire, and Dover; the lords Falkland, Newark, Rich, Coventry, Capel, Grey of Ruthven, Pawlett, Saville, Dunsmore, Mowbray, Maltravers, Howard of Carleton, Lovelace, Mohun, and Seymour. Many other noblemen were employed in behalf of the royal cause, in different parts of the kingdom; a great number of the most powerful commoners espoused it; and it was supported by the two universities: all in general, whose manners were polished, and whose minds were enlarged by a liberal education, adhered to the king. The opposite faction consisted of those whom the court had personally disobliged; of such as wanted to fish in troubled waters; of republicans and dissenters, comprehending a great number of corporations, manufacturers, and the lower class of people, inflamed with the spirit of fanaticism.

The civil war was not yet declared. The parliament had, by its own authority, appointed one sir John Hotham governor of Hull, a fortress on the sea-coast of Yorkshire, and which had, for a long time been a magazine for arms and ammunition: on the twenty-second of April, Charles, attended with three hundred horse, came before the place, and prepared to enter; but Hotham refused to open the gates of his garrison to admit him. At first he sent Charles a respectful message, desiring him not to approach; but his majesty continuing to advance, Hotham ordered the bridge to be drawn up, the gates to be shut, and the garrison to be drawn out in a posture of resistance. When Charles came near enough to be heard on the walls, he called for Hotham, and demanded entrance, which Hotham refused, under pretext of his being appointed to that trust by the authority of parliament. It was in vain for Charles to repeat the demand of admittance; all he could obtain, was that his son and friends in the place should be sent out to him; for the governor would not admit him, though he offered to reduce his train to twenty persons: and when he had tarried upwards of five hours before the place, he retired, about four o'clock in the afternoon, to Beverley, after proclaiming Hotham a traitor by two heralds at arms.

I shall not attempt to trouble the reader with those papers which flew between Charles and his parliament, after the former had demanded from the latter justice upon Hotham; it is sufficient to say that Hotham was not only vindicated, but rewarded for what he had done; and we are from this period to date the actual commencement of that unhappy civil war which afterwards followed.

The nation was at this time in a very miserable situation. The king issued out commissions of array all over the kingdom, and the execution of them was voted to be treasonable by the parliament.

The parliament made an ordinance, by which they took the militia into their own hands; and the execution of that was proclaimed to be treason by Charles: it was impossible for any man to be neutral between the two parties; but the parliament was amazed to find themselves mistaken in their own strength, and that so great a part of the kingdom held with Charles. Lord-keeper Littleton, when he repaired to the king at York, had brought with him the great-seal of England, without which it was supposed there could be no law enacted: however, the parliament continued to enact laws, which were obeyed by their partizans as effectually as if they had the royal sanction. The proceedings of the two parties being thus incompatible, both sides made themselves ready to decide the contest by force of arms. A little before, the parliament had sent to Charles nineteen propositions, which containing such demands as no crowned heads could accede to, he rejected; and, in a declaration he published, wrote such an answer as must have satisfied every person whose judgment was not biased by rancour and prepossession: but he had to deal with a set of men who had planned a total revolution of government, and who had proceeded too far in this design to recede with safety; for this reason, they no sooner received the king's answer, than they issued a declaration, representing the absolute necessity of putting themselves in a posture of defence against the violent designs of the king. They ordered an army to be raised for their defence, the command of which they gave to the earl of Essex, and they voted the earl of Bedford to be general of the horse; but both these and the other officers were to be under the inspection of a committee of the two houses, who were to fill up all commissions. Great names were engaged on their side: Hampden, Whitlock, Maynard, Grimston, St. John, and Selden, all of them great authorities in the law and constitution, accepted of parliament's commissions under the ordinance of the militia; but the great weight of landed interest operated for the king. Charles was furnished with money from the queen, on the jewels she had sold or pawned: but the parliament had a much better resource in public credit, upon which great sums were raised on loan; and little hostilities were already commenced between the royal and parliamentary party all over England. Luckily for the parliament, they had found means to get the important garrison of Portsmouth into their hands, and to secure the fleet; but Charles was baffled in an attempt to secure Hull, where the great magazine of arms still continued, and which, by a private concert between the lord Digby and Hotham, who now repented of his insolence to his sovereign, was to be delivered up to the king; but Hotham, either not having power or sincerity enough to perform his engagements, the matter came to nought.

On the first of August the king summoned the principal gentry of the county of York, and acquainted them with the parliament's preparations for war, and desired their advice and assistance: for the parliament had now published a declaration for the raising all power and force, by trained-bands or otherwise, to make head against all traitors and their adherents that opposed the parliament, and them to kill and slay as enemies to the peace of the kingdom; and in it they named most of the king's lord lieutenants and commissioners of array in the several counties. The king then recommend to them the completing of a regiment for the prince; and that he might not be behind hand with the parliament, he published a proclamation, wherein the earl of Essex was pronounced a rebel and traitor to the king and crown; and all colonels and officers, authorized by the parliament, that should not instantly lay down their arms, were declared guilty of high-treason. To obviate this the parliament had declared, "that whosoever shall return from the king to the parliament's army, within ten days after publication, should have reception and pardon, excepting persons impeached of delinquency or treason, or such as have been eminent actors against them, and except the duke of Richmond, the earls of Bristol, Cumberland, Newcastle, Rivers, and Caernarvon, the viscounts Newark and Falkland, secretary Nicholas Endymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde. The king hearing the parliament intended sending an army westward, gave commission, under the great-seal of England, to the marquis of Hertford to be his lieutenant-general within the counties of Devon, Cornwall, Somerset, Dorset, Wilts, Southampton, Berks, Oxford, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecknock, Glamorgan, Caernarvon, Pembroke, and Cardigan; and sent to encourage colonel Goring, who commanded in Portsmouth at that time for him. Charles soon after left York, and nothing remarkable happened to him, excepting that the city of Coventry shut her gates against him and his troops; and, on the twenty-fifth of August, he set up his standard at Nottingham, but very few appeared, except a body of militia and about three hundred regular troops, and those very ill armed. Thus disappointed, he once more turned his thoughts to peace, and sent a message to the two houses by the earls of Southampton and Dorset, and some other gentlemen, in order to a treaty of accommodation. In this message the king signified, "that many mistakes had arisen by the messages, petitions, and answers, between him and the two houses of parliament, which might be prevented by some other way of treaty, wherein the matters in difference might be more clearly understood, and more freely transacted; he proposed that a certain number of persons might be sent, and enabled by the parliament to treat, in some indifferent place, with a like number authorized by him." Charles then, in a very pathetic manner, disclaimed all intentions to injure his people's liberties, and lays the guilt at the door of the parliament, if they refuse his offer. The parliament returned for answer, that they could agree to no terms, unless he would immediately take down his standard and recal his proclamations against them by a certain day. And here the correspondence broke off. This negotiation, unsuccessful as it was, did Charles no small service; every one saw by what spirit the parliament was influenced: they had treated the earl of Southampton, and the other messengers from the king, with infinite indignity, and without paying even common civility to their persons. The purport of the king's message was sufficiently public; and the parliament, instead of thinking upon peace, ordered all their officers to repair to their respective posts immediately, and Essex himself set out with all haste to the army: this was not all, for they published a most insolent declaration in vindication of their own conduct, and vilely aspersing the character of the king and his friends. This, with many other papers that continued to pass between the king and the parliament, turned the tide of popular affection strongly in favour of Charles, whose wants and weakness were inexpressible, while the parliament had in their hands all the revenues of the crown, his bishops, the dignitaries of the church, the friends of his person, and an uncontracted power of raising what money they pleased. The earl of Essex had now drawn his army together at Northampton, and found it to amount to about sixteen thousand men, well armed and well provided with artillery, cloaths, money, and in high spirits. Charles had sent sir John Byron into Oxfordshire, with a small party of horse, to bring him the plate which had been presented him by that university: the lord Hertford and the loyalists in the West at first had vast appearance of success; and he now received intelligence from all hands of great levies that were making for his service: this gave Charles some hopes amongst many discouragements, and at last he resolved to leave Nottingham, and to put the issue to the fate of arms.

On the appearance of troubles in England, the princes Rupert (or Robert) and Maurice, sons to the unhappy Palatine, had made a tender of their service to the king, and the former at this time commanded a body of horse, which had been sent to Worcester, in order to watch the motions of Essex, while the king set out upon his march for Shrewsbury, which, indeed, was the most convenient part of the kingdom for his rendezvous. While he was upon his march every hour brought him great accessions of strength; and when he arrived at Wellington, within a days march of Shrewsbury, he ordered his army to be drawn up, and on reviewing it, found it to amount to about ten thousand men. Lord Lindsey, who in his youth had learned the art of war in the Low Countries, was general; prince Rupert commanded the horse; sir John Astly, the foot; sir Arthur Aston, the dragoons; sir John Heydon, the artillery. The lord Bernard Stuart was at the head of a troop of guards; their servants, under the conduct of William Killegrew, composed another troop, and always marched with their masters. On this occasion Charles made to them a speech, so full of affectionate expressions, as rendered him to their thoughts an injured prince; and moved their compassion and loyalty so much, that they swore one and all to conquer or die in his cause. Some little time after his arrival at Shrewsbury, he received the news of an action, the first which had happened in these wars, and wherein his troops were successful.

The earl of Essex had by this time marched with his army towards Worcester, upon intelligence that the king himself intended to secure that place: luckily sir John Byron had first taken possession of that city for the king, in spite of the endeavours of captain Fiennes, who strove to dislodge him with some troops of the parliament and county-volunteers, with whom he assaulted the town on the western side of the Severn: while they were engaged, prince Rupert arrived, with his brother Maurice, and had scarce alighted when he perceived five hundred horse of Essex's army, commanded by colonel Sandys, advancing through a defile just at hand: he and his company immediately mounted, and, with admirable courage and presence of mind, attacked the enemy just as they came out of the same, and totally routed them, with the loss of their commander and thirty men killed on the spot, and took several of their officers prisoners. The success of this first skirmish wonderfully spirited the royalists, and impressed the enemy with a terror of prince Rupert, who gave such an early proof of his extraordinary courage and bravery. The prince, after the engagement, threw himself into Worcester; but hearing that Essex was marching thither with his whole army, he quitted it, and retired to Ludlow, twenty miles from thence: nor was this intelligence ill founded, for, immediately after the prince's retreat, Essex came to Worcester with his army, where he continued a month: from whence he detached the earl of Stamford, with a party, to Hereford, in order to impede the king's levies in South Wales; and sent other detachments to take possession of Gloucester and Bristol. The parliament began now to apprehend the king's strength; for many began to appear for him in several parts of the kingdom: in the northern parts of Yorkshire, the marquis of Newcastle, the earl of Cumberland, sir Marmaduke Longdale, sir Francis Wortley, and many others, had raised a great number of soldiers; and were so powerful, that the lord Fairfax, sir Thomas Fairfax his son, sir John Hotham and his son captain Hotham, who had assembled some men for the service of the parliament, were not able to make head against them. In Cornwall, a body was forming under sir Bevil Grenville, and sir Nicholas Stanning; and sir Ralph Hopton, a gentleman of good conduct and courage, was hastening to them, to assist in their levies: and many others in several parts of the kingdom were arming on both sides. Whilst the affairs of England were in a military posture, Ireland was neglected: some few regiments were sent over from Scotland, and the earl of Leicester's regiment, under colonel Monk, from England, but in no proportion to the necessities of that kingdom; nevertheless they made many impressions upon their enemies in Leinster and Ulster, but Munster was but meanly supplied.

It was now about the middle of October when the king, having raised such an army as he thought would enable him to act upon the offensive, began his march from Shrewsbury towards London; and in two days after his departure, the earl of Essex put himself in motion to attack his rear. On the twenty-second of October the two armies were within six miles of each other; the king, having received intelligence that Essex had advanced to Kempton, a village on the borders of Warwickshire, drew up his army on Edge-hill, about two miles from the enemy, and on Sunday the twenty-third of the month, gave the earl battle. The engagement, which was carried on with great bravery on both sides, lasted till night parted the combatants: the next day both parties claimed the victory, but neither seemed inclined to renew the battle. Essex, however, first drew off, and retired to Warwick; the king returned to his former quarters. Each side had now time to discover its loss, but it was greatest on the side of the parliament; and no less than five thousand are said to have fallen of both armies in the fight. The earl of Lindsey, whose son, the lord Willoughby, was taken prisoner in attempting to rescue his father, was carried in his wounds to a barn, where he expired with great magnanimity, and with high sentiments of the justice of the cause he died for, before the surgeons could arrive, whom the earl of Essex humanely sent to dress his wounds. The lord Aubigny, brother to the duke of Richmond, and sir Edward Verney, the king's standard-bearer, were likewise among the number of the slain, on the king's part, and several other officers, but none of distinction. On the side of the parliament were killed the lord St. John and colonel Essex, one of their officers. The chief prisoners on the king's side were the lord Willoughby, sir Thomas Lundsford, sir Edward Stradling, and sir William Vavasor: no gentleman of distinction, except sir William Essex, father to the colonel was taken prisoner by the king.

The news of this action reaching London, the commons and their adherents were at first greatly alarmed; but expresses arriving from the army soon convinced them that their cause had received but a slight check; nay, they even assumed the merit of the victory, and ordered public thanksgivings for the same. Their next step was to order the king's children to be removed from St. James's into the city; orders were given to fortify the neck of land over against Durham-house; and that the papists in Lancaster should be secured. An ordinance, both by the lords and commons, passed for providing a maintenance for the wounded soldiers, and the families of those who should be killed, in their service. The prisoners in and about London were confined more strictly than ever; and all shops were ordered to be shut up, that the shopkeepers and apprentices* might be at greater freedom to attend the defence of the kingdom.

After the royal army was sufficiently refreshed, it was again put in motion. A party of horse advanced to Reading, which Mr. Martin commanded for the parliament; at the approach of which, both the governor and garrison were seized with a sudden panic, and fled precipitately to London. Charles, imagining that every thing would now yield before him, conducted his whole army to Reading; and, in a few days after, advanced to Colnbrook. While he lay here, the parliament

* As the body of London apprentices are frequently mentioned in the history of these troubles, and also in the succeeding reign, as a formidable corps of militia, it may not be amiss to insert the following character of them, as drawn up by a modern historian. "The London apprentices were a set which gained great honour to their party at this juncture: those hot-beds of education, so common now-a-days, which ripen childhood into youth, and youth into manhood, were then but little known; and apprentices were young men from sixteen to twenty-four years of age, vigorous in their bodies, and unbroken in their constitution, through temperance, regular diet, and moderate exercise. They borrowed their notions of religion and government from their parents and masters: and the parliament had given them a manumission from their services in the shop, to encourage their appearing in the field: they had been for several months daily exercised by Skippon, major-general of the parliament forces, and were now become so familiar with the ideas of war, that they thought its greatest hazards, in what they imagined to be the defence of their country, to be preferable to the toils of the counter. A body of active, stout, young men, thus taught, thus fed, thus principled, and thus disciplined, was far from being that awkward contemptible enemy modern writers have represented."

sent a message to him, by the earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commoners, requesting his majesty to fix on some convenient place for his residence near London, till commissioners should attend him, with proposals for healing the present unhappy breach between him and his parliament. Charles named Windsor; and required that the garrison should be withdrawn, and his own troops received into the castle. Northumberland, and the rest, immediately posted back with this answer; and, on his arrival at Westminster, prevailed with the parliament to write a letter to the king, intimating a cessation of arms on their part, and requiring the like on his; but it happened that same night (November 11) that Charles had dispatched the parliament's messengers, news was brought, that Essex had, by long and hasty marches, advanced with his army and artillery, and had possessed himself of Windsor, Hampton, and Acton; and that he was now fortifying himself in Brentford; which if he was suffered to do, the king's army would be so straitened, that it could neither make any motion, nor, indeed, subsist. Whereupon a council of war being called, prince Rupert was ordered to attack the parliament's regiments and works at Brentford, which he did with irresistible fury; and notwithstanding the noble resistance the regiment of Holles made, they were all cut off, drowned, wounded, or taken prisoners; and prince Rupert remained master of Brentford. Loud were the complaints raised against this attack by the parliament party, as being an instance of the most apparent perfidy, and a breach of the treaty then negotiating on both sides. Inspired with resentment, as well as concerned for its own safety, the city marched its trained-bands, in excellent order, to reinforce the army under Essex; who drew up his forces, now amounting to twenty-four thousand men, at Turnham-green*, to oppose the march of the king towards London, for which Charles was now preparing; but finding the number of the enemy so greatly superior to his own, he thought it most prudent to retire over the bridge at Kingston to Otlands, and from thence to Reading, where he left a good garrison; and then marched with his army to Oxford.

While matters passed thus in the neighbourhood of the capital, the king's forces in the North became very considerable; the earl of Newcastle and the earl of Cumberland having joined each other with their troops, made up a little army of eight thousand horse and foot, which were daily encreasing; so that lord Fairfax and his son, Sir Robert Fairfax, and others who commanded for the parliament in those parts, were not able to make head against them, especially after the arrival of colonel Goring at Newcastle, with a supply of two hundred men and ammunition from Holland. Upon this, Fairfax applied to the parliament for assistance, and they found means to engage the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, and the city of Norwich, in an association, to stand by them with their arms and fortunes; and the lord Grey, of Werk, received a commission from Essex, appointing him commander in chief in those parts, with an authority to raise forces.

About the beginning of February, 1643, the queen landed from Holland, at Burlington bay, with a considerable supply of artillery, arms, and ammunition; and, very shortly after, set out again in quest of new succours. Sir Hugh Cholmley, who had the government of Scarborough for the parliament, declared for the king, and with him three hundred men of his garrison. Sir John Hotham also, and his son, were at this time inclined to play the double traitor, and desert the parliament's service; but their intentions being discovered, they were both seized at Hull, and sent up prisoners to London, where they afterwards paid the forfeit of their treasons with their lives. The parliament, having fortified Gloucester with a good garrison, thought of enlarging their quarters towards Oxford; and had, in order thereto, thrown a strong body of forces into Cirencester. Charles, not liking this neighbourhood, ordered prince Rupert, with four thousand horse and foot, to make himself, if possible, master of that town. That active commander readily undertook the service, and succeeded, by taking the town by storm, cutting in pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, taking eleven hundred prisoners, about four thousand stands of arms, and the enemy's whole magazine. Notwithstanding this success, Charles still hoped to relieve the calamities of his people, and wished to recover his own broken fortune by an equitable peace, and therefore proposed a treaty to the parliament; to which, after many debates, they consented; and about the beginning of March, the earl of Northumberland, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. William Armyne, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulstrode Whitlock, attended him at Oxford with propositions of peace; but they were dictated in such an arbitrary stile, and so debased the very essence of majesty, that they seemed to breathe the language of successful traitors, not the desires of patriotic or peaceful subjects. Charles, however, resolved to have them discussed; but he found the commissioners so straitened in time, and tied to such particular instructions by the two houses, that nothing could be brought about that could conduce to compose the reigning disorders of the commonwealth, without absolutely sacrificing the kingly character; insomuch, that, after many messages between London and Oxford, the commissioners returned to the parliament on the seventeenth of April; upon which, the earl of Essex was ordered to advance with his army to besiege the king's garrison in Reading.

Essex had under him twenty thousand fine well-appointed troops; the town was but indifferently fortified, and had in it a garrison of three thousand foot, and about three hundred horse, commanded by Sir Arthur Aston, and under him colonel Fielding. The largeness, and ill condition of the place, but, above all, the consumption of powder which its defence must require, and with which Charles was very ill provided, had given him some thoughts of drawing the garrison and magazines off to Oxford; but before this could be done, the

* We cannot here omit the oration major-general Skippon made at the head of his Londoners, to animate them, as it is so characteristic, both of the man and the spirit of the party: "Come my boys, says he, my brave boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily; I will run the same fortunes and hazards with you; remember the cause is for God, the defence of yourselves, your wives and children: come, my honest brave boys, let us pray heartily and fight heartily, and God will bless us."

place was invested by Essex. His approaches were so indifferently carried on, that the parliament's engineers appeared to be very little acquainted with the business of besieging towns. They had, however, such advantages by the situation of the place, that their cannon played directly into the town, and one of their shot disabled Aston, to the irreparable loss of the king, who was now preparing to relieve the place; but while he was upon his march, the garrison, under Fielding, who had succeeded Aston in command, after killing, in their sallies, a great number of parliamentarians, found themselves obliged to capitulate, and to deliver up the town; for which, Fielding was afterwards sentenced to lose his head by a council of war at Oxford, but he was pardoned by Charles. The articles of capitulation were extremely advantageous for Charles, by giving him back his whole garrison; but they were very ill observed by the parliamentarians, which occasioned severe reprisals afterwards by the royal party.

At this time scarce one county in England was free from the horror of civil war; the royalists were victorious in most parts; in Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Staffordshire, many encounters passed between the king's forces under prince Rupert, and the earl of Northampton, the lord Brooke, Sir John Gill, and Sir William Brereton, for the parliament; in one of which, fought on Hopton heath, the earl of Northampton lost his life, and the lord Brooke was slain before the town of Litchfield, which was afterwards taken by his forces, and again retaken by prince Rupert. In Yorkshire, and the more northern parts, the lord Fairfax and his son, Sir Thomas, afterwards so famous under the title of General Fairfax, had success greater than could be expected from the small force they had with them; but at length the whole county was reduced by the king's troops, and Fairfax, with his followers, were obliged to shut themselves up in Hull. The greatest part of Wales remained firm to the royal cause; the parliament, therefore, in order to check the king's good fortune in that part of the country, dispatched the earl of Stamford with an army into the West, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with his forces, lay before Plymouth, in the parliament's possession. Sir Ralph, hearing of the earl's approach, drew forth his troops and gave him battle, in which he defeated the greatest part of his forces; and then a truce was agreed upon between the earl and him for three weeks; during which time sir George Chudleigh, who had been very active and successful for the parliament in Denbighshire, upon a due reflection on the views of both parties in the present unnatural contest, quitted the opposition, and joined himself to the king; but, to satisfy his friends of the reasons of this tergiversation, he published a short declaration, which we are persuaded our readers will be pleased to see, not only as it is doing great honour to the understanding, integrity, and patriotic loyalty of this gallant officer, but as it speaks the sentiments of most of the moderate part of the opposition, in regard to the state of affairs between the king and parliament at this juncture.

"That petitions of right, says he, are commendable, and remonstrances may be useful; but arms, though defensive, are very doubtful. My lot (says he) fell to cast on the parliament side, by a strong opinion of the goodness of their cause, which, to my judgment, then appeared to be so. Religion, and the subjects liberty, seemed to me to be in danger; but the destruction of kingdoms cannot be the way to save it, nor can the loss of Christian subjects, nor the subjects loss of their estates by plunder or assessment, concur with piety, nor yet with propriety: as for religion, which is the chief, his majesty (whom God long preserve) has given us unquestionable security. I have cast myself at my sovereign's feet, and implored his gracious pardon; I will contend no more in word or deed. And this my resolution, with the indisputable grounds thereof, I thought good to declare to my friends and countrymen, that they may understand that my change doth proceed from no compulsion."

The parliamentarians, however, were not discouraged; they knew they had powerful resources, and though for the present unsuccessful, they still acted as masters against whom the king had rebelled. They condemned and executed for treason several of their fellow-subjects, who had delivered up to the king his own towns*; while the king, on his side, refrained from all cruel reprisals on his prisoners. This conduct may serve to justify, in the opinion of posterity, a prince who has been represented so criminal towards his people, and teach us to pity the unnatural persecution he suffered from his subjects, while we blame the causes of offence he had given them; for which, however, he had offered every atonement, every reparation, that majesty could make.

The two capital armies, that under Charles, and that under Essex, lay all this while inactive; the former about Abingdon and Oxford, the latter about Reading. Essex, in the whole of his operations against the king, seems to have been under the constant check of rencountering loyalty. According to the account given of the battle of Edge hill by the earl of Clarendon himself, he could have taken the king and the two princes prisoners, but forbore, most probably from the motives already assigned; in fine, a strong probability arises, that he was not yet in earnest in the opposition, and that he never intended to carry hostilities farther against the king and his party than was necessary for his own defence in the service he had embraced. However this might be, his conduct appeared very doubtful to his best friends, and the violent party in parliament could not help distrusting him; they now openly blamed him for not marching against Oxford; and, as the parliament officers who served under him were daily improving in military knowledge, he could find no pretext for longer inactivity, being lately joined by Sir William Waller, who had by this

* Yeamans and Boucher were executed at Bristol, for endeavouring to seize that town for the king; the like happened to several gentlemen and citizens of London, for a design laid to seize the city and several members of parliament, in order to have put a period to the civil war, by stopping the issues of it in the fountain. Edmund Waller, the famous poet, was on

time reduced Hereford, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Worcester; he made a march towards Oxford, and fixed his head quarters at Thame, upon the borders of Buckinghamshire, in order to over-awe that county, which now grew turbulent in favour of Charles.

While he remained in this post, colonel Urrey, a Scotch officer, who had served in Germany with general Ruthven, now created earl of Brentford, took this opportunity of deserting to the king, and persuaded prince Rupert to beat up the quarters of the enemy, after having particularly informed him of their disposition. To demonstrate the practicability of such an exploit, he proposed to go as a volunteer with a detachment, which he conducted to part of these quarters, where he defeated some regiments and brought a great number of prisoners to Oxford. Prince Rupert, encouraged by his success, complied with his advice in making a more vigorous attack upon that part of their army, which was quartered at Thame. They departed from Oxford with a strong body of horse, and taking a long circuit in the night, arrived, by break of day, at Wickham, where they cut in pieces two regiments of the enemy; they attacked another quarter with the same success, and attempted to retire by a bridge, at which they had left a sufficient guard. By this time the earl of Essex had taken the alarm and detached part of his cavalry to detain the prince till he should be able to advance with the infantry. They overtook him at the skirts of Chalgrave-field, where he wheeled about, and charged them with such impetuosity, that they betook themselves to flight, after having lost some of their best officers, and among the rest the celebrated John Hampden, who had acted as colonel of a regiment, since the beginning of the war, and proved in many encounters that his courage was equal to any other of his extraordinary endowments. The candour and moderation for which this gentleman was distinguished in the beginning of the opposition to the king's measures, had given way to a violent animosity against the ancient constitution, and the person of his sovereign, by whom he had been declared guilty of high-treason. This was an affront he never could forgive. He became passionate, and even ferocious; discouraged all overtures towards an accommodation, and now his death struck a damp into the hearts of the whole faction. Other officers were slain or taken prisoners. The army under Essex was dispirited by these checks, diminished by distempers and want of necessaries, so that he thought proper to remove from Thame and put his troops into quarters of refreshment at St. Alban's, Uxbridge, and other places in that neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Rupert returned in triumph to Oxford, and recommended Urrey to the king in such warm encomiums of his courage and conduct, that he received the honour of knighthood, and was preferred to the command of a regiment.

The king's affairs still wore a favourable aspect in the western counties, where the neutrality was over-ruled as in the North by the votes and declarations of the parliament. Major Chudleigh, with a body of the enemy, made an attempt upon Launceston, but being repulsed, retired to Kingston. About the middle of May, the earl of Stamford marching into Cornwall, at the head of seven thousand horse and foot, with a train of artillery, encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton, and detached sir George Chudleigh, with twelve hundred cavalry, to surprize the sheriff of the county at Bodmin. The Cornish loyalists, under lord Mohun and sir Ralph Hopton, seized this opportunity of attacking their infantry in the absence of their horse: they formed their small army into four divisions, and attacked the hill in as many different parts; after a very warm contest, they met upon the summit, disarmed major-general Chudleigh, routed the parliamentarians, and took possession of their cannon and camp, while the earl of Stamford retired with precipitation to Exeter, and sir George Chudleigh, with their cavalry, took the same route from Bodmin, as soon as he was informed of the earl's disaster. The victorious loyalists, having received orders to join prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford, who had advanced as far as Somersetshire, began their march, and joining the marquis at Chard, the two bodies united, amounted to above seven thousand men, in excellent order, with a good train of artillery: thus strengthened, they took Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunster castle, almost without opposition.

The reputation which the Cornish men obtained in this action, gave infinite spirits to the king's party; and the affair of the West became now the principal object both with Charles and the parliament; the latter put Sir William Waller at the head of a new army, to march into Somersetshire and retrieve their affairs. Waller was a man of spirit and fortune, and had served the parliament so effectually on many occasions, that, in the city of London, he obtained the name of William the Conqueror; he was a thorough paced republican, and was considered by the violent of the parliament party as the most proper officer to succeed Essex, if it should be found necessary to lay that general aside: in this expedition, however, he proved very unfortunate, for, in less than a fortnight, he lost two battles, one at Lansdown, on the fifth of July, wherein Sir Bevil Grenville was slain; and another at Roundway-down, on July the tenth; in the latter of which, his army was entirely routed, and so dispersed, that it was no longer serviceable; Waller himself fled to Bristol.

The affairs of the king in the North at this time went on very prosperously; the queen had again returned to England with a second supply of men, and a sum of money she had raised by pawning the crown-jewels in Holland; for which the parliament, agreeable to the usual spirit of their proceedings, had voted her guilty of high-treason. Matters, however, were so successful for Charles, that the queen ventured to obey him, by marching south, with all the troops, artillery, and ammunition, under her command, and found her royal consort at Edge-hill, on the very day his troops gained the battle of Roundway-down: from Edge-hill they entered Oxford in a triumphant manner, while the Cornish forces reduced Bath, and then marched to form the siege of Bristol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. It was the twenty-fourth day of July, before the approaches began; the place was rich, and garrisoned by two thousand five hundred foot, and a regiment of horse, under the command of Fiennes, who was but an indifferent foldier. After some deliberation, the city was assaulted by the loyalists with such incredible courage, that the garrison beat a parley, and surrendered upon terms. Besides this important success, Charles, at this time, gained another, by prince Rupert's seizing the ships in which the most wealthy citizens of Bristol had embarked their riches, with a view of conveying them to London.

All this time Charles had subsisted his forces by contributions and assessments, or by loans, and voluntary presents from all parts of the kingdom; but the supplies, even including those brought him by his queen, were still very disproportionable to his pressing necessities. The resources of the parliament were more numerous, and more considerable: and, of consequence, all their military preparations were in much greater order and readiness. Besides a tax levied in London, amounting to the twenty-fifth part of every one's substance, they imposed on that city a weekly assessment of ten thousand pounds, and another of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen, on the rest of the kingdom: and as their authority was very great in most counties, they levied these taxes with the utmost regularity.

A few days after the taking of Bristol, Charles went to view that city, in which he had not long arrived before he received news of the surrender of Dorchester to the earl of Caernarvon; and a day or two after, Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe, submitted likewise; so that by the end of this summer, the royal party was in possession of all the western counties from the farthest part of Cornwall, except some few garrisons that were blocked up. In the North, even to the borders of Scotland, there was no army in the field to oppose the king, and his forces marched whithersoever they pleased. London was now greatly divided between the two parties; many of the wealthier and more creditable citizens favoured the king's cause; and most of the gentry of the associated counties already mentioned, were ready, upon the first appearance of the king at the head of his army, to have secured those counties for him. These considerations seemed naturally to point out, as the only rational step, that the king should have marched with his army to London, and have dispatched the earl of Newcastle, at the head of his victorious band, into the associated counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a speedy end would, in all probability, have been put to this civil war. But, in the midst of these hopes, the king calling a council at Bristol, to deliberate how he was next to employ his arms, it was resolved, that the Western army should be sent back to protect the loyalists in their own counties, and that the siege of Gloucester should be forthwith undertaken. Nothing could be more fatal to the king's affairs than this last resolution; a few days after which, the earl of Newcastle sat down before Hull, where the lord Fairfax had taken refuge, after several repeated defeats; and who, assisted by one colonel Meldrum, a Scotchman, defended the place with great bravery and conduct for several weeks, though he was vigorously attacked; at last, on the eleventh of October, the besieged made a grand sally, and after a very obstinate fight, which was several times renewed, drove the besiegers from their trenches, and seized upon their cannon; whereupon Newcastle was obliged to raise the siege. The same day this sally was made by the garrison of Hull, part of the earl of Newcastle's army, commanded by the lord Widdrington, was routed at Horncastle, by the earl of Manchester, a general of the parliament's forces, who had with him Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, which latter, by a painful observance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cause, was now become a lieutenant-colonel under the parliament: he had never been in foreign service; and, if we may believe his contemporaries, his courage was rather the result of experience and reason, than the effect of his natural disposition; as he was a perfect judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite scheme, of inspiring those under him, and about him, with an enthusiasm that might overbalance all the sentiments of honour, loyalty, and duty, in the other party. How well this succeeded, the subsequent part of this history will demonstrate to us.

To the fatal siege of Gloucester the king in person, with his army, marched in the beginning of August; and about the tenth of that month he sat down before it, with about eight thousand horse and foot, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which were frequently interrupted by the sallies of the besieged. The parliament greatly fearing the loss of this place, dispatched the earl of Essex instantly to its relief, who began his march from Hounslow Heath on the twenty-sixth of August. The rendezvous of his troops was at Aylesbury, where being joined by the lord Grey and reinforcements from the associated counties, he found himself at the head of eight thousand infantry, and half that number of horse; then he continued his march by Brackley, though he was a little incommoded by a detachment of the king's horse, sent on purpose to harass him with light skirmishes. He proceeded, however, with great expedition, and the king's forces abandoning their works at his approach, he entered Gloucester in triumph, when the garrison was reduced to extremity. Having supplied the city with provision, ammunition, and reinforced the garrison, he marched to Tewkesbury, whence he made a sudden motion to Cirencester, where he surprized two regiments of the royalists, and seized a great quantity of provisions prepared for the king's army: then he took his route through the northern parts of Wiltshire, having marched twenty miles before the king was informed of his motions. Prince Rupert was immediately sent after him, in order to intercept his march till the king could come up in person, with the rest of the army. This general came up with the earl as he was marching over Aubourn Chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night: a sharp conflict ensued, prince Rupert charged the earl's rear with such fury that it was put into great disorder. The marquis de la Vieuville, a French officer, who had attended the queen out of Holland, and served the king as a volunteer, was killed in this action, which, by its ill success obliged Essex to take up his quarters at Hungerford. The next day he continued his march towards Newbury, but found that the king had prevented him by two hours, and had posted himself near that town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day (September 18), went and joined the royal army. It is certain that

Charles was possessed of advantages in consequence of this situation, which, had he known how to preserve them, must have proved decisive in his favour; but his officers had such a contempt of the London apprentices, which composed a great part of Essex's army (and whose character we have already mentioned), that, forgetting all the advantages they had, they attacked the parliamentarians in strong parties, till a general engagement became unavoidable; for Essex, finding his soldiers eager to return the affronts of the royal army, led them on in person to the fight, about six o'clock in the morning of the twentieth of September, which was continued with great gallantry on both sides till night put an end to the dispute. In this engagement, which was known by the title of the First Battle of Newbury, the royal army suffered greatly, and its loss was much aggravated by the quality of those that fell in the fight, there being slain, besides twenty officers of note, Ralph Dormer earl of Caernarvon, Henry Spencer earl of Sunderland, and Lucius Carey viscount Falkland, secretary of state, a nobleman universally respected by all who knew him, for his great parts, ingenuity, and honour; he was a zealous promoter of all endeavours towards peace between the king and parliament: he fell in the thirty-fourth year of his age. Whatever lord Clarendon may please to assert, the victory was certainly on the side of the parliament: Charles recalled his troops from the field, and left Essex to pursue his march to Reading unmolested, where he arrived, after the battle of Newbury, to be at hand to protect the city of London, the very thing Charles wanted to prevent him from doing. Upon the whole, it was no wonder if Essex, at his arrival at Reading, on the twenty-second of September, ordered public thanks to be given in the town, and was moreover welcomed with his army into London with triumphal honours by the city and parliament; while the king, with a disconcerted, disconsolate army, took up his winter quarters about Oxford. It appears, by the Journals of the House of Commons, that the faction there were unwilling their army should quit Reading; nor, indeed, does it appear to me why it was abandoned to the royalists, unless it was owing to the impatience of the Londoners to return home. Massey and the garrison of Gloucester were nobly rewarded, and the several committees were appointed to look to the recruiting the army, as if their intention had been that very winter to have attacked Oxford itself, where every thing was in the utmost confusion and despair.

During the interval between the king's laying siege to Gloucester and the battle of Newbury, several transactions happened, which we shall now briefly mention. The two houses received Waller, after the defeat in the West, with the warmest expressions of esteem: he was appointed commander in chief of the forces and militia of London; and they declared they would enable him to take the field again, to relieve their distressed friends in the West. They passed an ordinance to raise a new army under the command of the earl of Manchester, to oppose the earl of Newcastle, and protect the associated counties of Essex, Hertford, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, and Lincoln: then they sent a committee of both houses to soothe the earl of Essex, who had been for some time disgusted, and had indeed conferred with the moderate party upon expedients to force the two houses into pacific measures. Whatever arguments the committee used, he was persuaded to re-adopt their sentiments; and his other friends, fearing he would discover their design, withdrew themselves from the parliament. The earl of Portland, lord Lovelace, and lord Conway, repaired to Oxford; and their example was followed by the earl of Clare; the earls of Bedford and Holland escaped to the king's garrison at Wallingford; and the earl of Northumberland retired to his own house at Petworth, in Sussex.

While the king was employed in the siege of Gloucester, the towns of Dorchester, Weymouth, and Portland surrendered to the earl of Caernarvon, who left his army under the command of prince Maurice, and repaired to the king, in discontent for some outrages which the troops had committed with impunity. Sir John Digby routed a party of the parliament's forces at Torrington; Barnstable and Biddeford were surrendered to him without opposition; and prince Maurice undertook the siege of Exeter, which was delivered into his hands by capitulation by the earl of Stamford. About the time we are now speaking of, the parliament resolved upon a very extraordinary action, which was the making a new great-seal: this innovation was at first very warmly opposed, but at length it was resolved upon by a majority of voices in both houses; yet, to preserve some colour of decency, they passed an order, "that if the lord-keeper Littleton did not, upon summons, return with the great-seal within fourteen days, he should lose his place; and whatever should be sealed therewith by him, after that time, should be null and void in law." But this menacing vote did not bring the great-seal from Oxford, so that the new great-seal was made, and some few months afterwards the use of it authorized by ordinance of both houses.

The court of France penetrated with the helpless situation of Charles, sent the count d'Harcourt (a prince of the house of Lorraine, and a great general) as ambassador to England, to offer the mediation of France to compose the differences between the king and the parliament. He came first to London, and addressed himself to both houses for a safe-conduct to Oxford, to the king, which they granted; and on the eighteenth of October he made his entry into that city, and three days after he had a public audience in the great hall at Christ-church, where the king and queen received him with great state and magnificence; and, whilst he staid at Oxford, he and his retinue were lodged in St. John's college: but finding himself unable to effect any thing by his embassy, after a few months stay he returned.

The parliament continued still stubborn and inflexible; and, what is very extraordinary, an assembly of a few men conducted their designs with more steadiness, than a king at the head of his army. The puritans having got the majority in both houses, threw aside the mask; they entered into a solemn league with Scotland, and signed the famous Covenant with that people. By this Covenant the subscribers bound themselves to support the reformed religion in the three kingdoms; to establish a uniformity in doctrine and discipline; to extirpate popery and prelacy; to maintain the privileges of the parliament and people; to defend his majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberty of the kingdom; to discover and punish incendiaries and malignants; to establish a firm peace and union to all posterity; and to renounce neutrality and resist temptation: to repent of their sins, amend their lives, and vie with each other in the great work of reformation." This Covenant was read in St. Margaret's church, at Westminster, in presence of both houses, by whom it was subscribed; and the commons ordered that it should be taken the following Sunday by all persons who lived under their jurisdiction.

It was plain by this covenant that the Scottish and English puritans wanted to erect themselves into a republic: this was the spirit of Calvinism, which had long been at work in France upon the same good design; it succeeded in Holland, but in France and England this darling scheme of the people could not be effected without shedding oceans of blood. The rage of civil war was cherished by the gloomy and austere behaviour, which was affected by the puritans. The parliament took this opportunity to oblige their Scottish friends by ordering the Book of Sports, composed by king James I. to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; they thought by this action to shew their religion, and to offer a stabbing insult to the reigning prince. In the course of this year the parliament likewise ordered that each family should deprive itself of one meal in the week, and contribute the value of it for carrying on the war. One of the strongest proofs of the inflexible stiffness which had taken possession of all minds at this time, is the punishment of William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, who was condemned by the parliament, after having been four years in prison: when this prelate was brought to his trial, he made such a vigorous defence, that the commons perceiving that he could not be capitally convicted in the common course of evidence, declared him guilty of high-treason by an act of attainder; although it remains a fact upon record, that the chief crime proved upon him, was his having made use of some of the ceremonies of the Romish communion at the consecration of a church in London. He pleaded the king's pardon, which had been conveyed to him from Oxford; but it was declared null by both houses. Being sentenced to the death of a common felon, he petitioned that, as he was a bishop, a privy-counsellor, and a peer of the realm, he might be indulged with decapitation, a request which the commons granted with difficulty. He suffered on the tenth of January, 1644, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Both kingdoms having agreed to the Covenant, the states of Scotland appointed commissioners to treat with the English, concerning the aid they desired, which was that they would bring into England to their assistance an army consisting of twenty-one thousand horse and foot; towards the raising of which the parliament sent one hundred thousand pounds into Scotland, and great levies of men were made for this army, which entered England the beginning of the year 1644, and took possession of Berwick: they were commanded by Lesly, an old officer under the earl of Leven. Charles finding the parliaments of England and Scotland both united against him, and being hard pressed between the two armies, thought it necessary to conclude a truce with the Roman catholics of Ireland; and prince Maurice and the earl of Antrim were sent to Ireland to bring over two thousand troops from thence to the west of Scotland by the first of April, where they were to be joined by the king's friends, and commanded by the earl of Montrose. At the same time the marquis of Ormond was ordered to send over some of the best regiments to the west of England. Lord Byron at the head of the forces brought over from Ireland, soon reduced the castles of Howarden, Breepton, Acton, and Dedington. Sir Thomas Fairfax, informed of these proceedings collected a body of four thousand men in Yorkshire, and, being reinforced by sir William Brereton, advanced against the enemy: the swelling of a rivulet, by an excessive rain, divided one part of Byron's army from the other; that part opposed to Fairfax being driven from their post, took shelter in the church of Acton, and were all made prisoners; the other fled with the utmost precipitation: and thus was dispersed and rendered useless that body of forces which had been transported from Ireland; and the parliament recovered their former footing in the north-west of England.

In the mean time the king, that he might weaken the authority of the parliament, issued a proclamation requiring the parliament to assemble at Oxford, at the same time recounting all the tumults, by which he and his partizans in both houses had been driven from London: and he thence inferred, that the assembly at Westminster was no longer a free parliament, and, till its liberty was restored, had no right to exact obedience to any of its orders. As this declaration was an obstacle to all treaty, of which, however, the king was extremely desirous, it became necessary to elude it by some kind of contrivance. A letter was accordingly sent to the earl of Essex, and subscribed by the prince, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen. They intreated him to use his endeavours for restoring peace to the country, and to promote that happy end with those by whom he was employed. Essex, though much dissatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, though apprehensive of the extremities to which they were driving, though willing to agree to any reasonable accommodation; yet was more anxious to discharge with fidelity the trust reposed in him. He replied, that as the paper sent him, was neither addressed to the two houses of parliament, nor acknowledged the authority of that assembly, he could not, by any means, impart it to them. Like proposals were repeated by the king during the ensuing campaign, and still met with a like denial from Essex.

In order to make another attempt towards a treaty, the king sent a letter directed to the lords and commons of parliament convened at Westminster: but as he likewise mentioned, in the letter, the lords and commons of parliament convened at Oxford, and expressed his desire that all the members of both houses might safely meet in a free and full assembly; the parliament, perceiving the conclusion which he meant to draw from this distinction, refused all treaty upon such terms. And the king, who despaired of all hopes of accommodation, would not forgo the pretensions, which he had assumed, nor acknowledge the two houses, more openly, for a parliament. About this time died the celebrated Pym; a man as much esteemed by one party, as hated by the other. The parliament considered considered him as the victim to national liberty, who had impaired his constitution and shortened his life by his constant and unwearied application. The royalists believed him to have been struck with an uncommon disease, and to have been consumed with vermin; as a mark of divine vengeance for his numerous crimes and treasons.

The invasion of the Scots was productive of the most important consequences. They had entered England on the nineteenth of January, with an army of eighteen thousand foot, three thousand horse, and between five and six hundred dragoons; Alexander Lesly earl of Leven was general, John Bowley lieutenant-general of the horse. Leven advanced to Newcastle, on the twenty-second of February, and having in vain summoned the town, which was defended by a strong garrison, he crossed the Tyne, to force the earl (lately created marquis) of Newcastle, who was encamped at Durham, with an army of fourteen thousand men to stop the progress of the Scottish army, and he would have succeeded in all probability but for a great misfortune which happened to his forces in Yorkshire: colonel Bellasis, whom he had left with a considerable body of troops, was entirely defeated at Selby, on the nineteenth of April, by sir Thomas Fairfax, who had returned with his victorious forces from defeating the army under the lord Byron. Apprehensive of being shut up between the two armies, Newcastle retired, and Leven joined his troops to those of lord Fairfax. They invested York, in which the army of the royalists had taken shelter: but as the Scottish and parliamentary forces were not sufficient to besiege in form so large a city, divided by a river, they contented themselves with forming a kind of blockade; and affairs remained for some time in suspense between these opposite armies.

Mean while the other parts of the kingdom were not free from the calamities of war: the lord Hopton was beat by general Waller, at Alresford, in Kent; and prince Rupert, on the other hand, gained a signal victory over the parliamentary forces who had formed the siege of Newark, under the lord Willoughby and sir John Meldrum, by which he preserved a free communication between the king's northern and southern conquests. After this the prince attacked Liverpool, a sea-port town on the edge of Cheshire, of which he made himself master: here he received a letter from the king, pressing him to relieve York, the siege of which was by this time begun, the earl of Leven and general Fairfax having been joined by the earl of Manchester, with a numerous body of infantry, who, on their march, had reduced the city of Lincoln. On the approach of prince Rupert, the parliament's generals immediately raised the siege; and drawing up their troops on Marston Moor, resolved to prevent the junction of the royalists; but prince Rupert approached the town by another side, and keeping the river Ouse between him and the enemy, safely joined his troops to those of the marquis of Newcastle. In a conference between the two generals the latter endeavoured to demonstrate that the Scots and English, being at variance, would separate in a few days of their own accord, and that he expected a reinforcement of five thousand men from the North: the prince on this occasion behaved in so imperious a manner as greatly incensed the marquis, who the next day, when the prince ordered the troops to be in readiness to engage, told him that he should not hesitate to obey his majesty's nephew, but insisted on resigning his authority, and serving only as a volunteer. On the third day of July the prince advanced against the enemy, and about two o'clock in the afternoon the action began, and lasted for some hours with great fury, and victory seemed ready to crown the efforts of the royal army, when the battle was restored by Oliver Cromwell (now made a lieutenant-general), who commanded the choice troops of the parliament, enured to danger under that undaunted leader, actuated by fanatic zeal, and regulated by the most severe discipline: in a word, after a very sharp conflict, in which the marquis of Newcastle, at the head of his regiment, performed miracles of valour, the royal army was entirely broken and dispersed, and a most complete victory was obtained by the parliament. The prince lost six thousand men, half of whom fell in the battle, together with all his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. After the battle the marquis of Newcastle, still resenting the insult he had received by the haughty carriage of prince Rupert, took shipping at Scarborough, and repaired to the continent, where he remained till the Restoration. Prince Rupert, confounded at his late overthrow, retired with the remains of his army into Lancashire abandoning York to its fate, which was in a few days yielded up to the parliament's forces by Glenham, the deputy-governor; Fairfax, entering the place, supplied it with a strong garrison, and detached a thousand horse into Lancashire, to reinforce the parliamentary army in that quarter, and attend the motions of prince Rupert: the Scottish army retired northwards, in order to meet the earl of Calender, who was coming to join them with ten thousand additional forces; and to besiege the town of Newcastle, which they took by storm: the earl of Manchester, with Cromwell, who had a capital share in gaining this great victory, and who was wounded in the action, repaired to the Eastern association, in order to recruit his army.

During these transactions in the North, the king's affairs wore a tolerable aspect in the South: two armies, under Essex and Waller, being by this time completed, those generals were ordered to advance with their combined forces towards Oxford, and, if the king took refuge in that city, to invest it, and by one enterprize finish the war. The king, leaving a sufficient garrison in Oxford, passed the enemy unnoticed, and bent his route to Worcester, and thereby the two parliament generals posted their armies between him and Oxford. The condition of Charles was now looked upon as desperate; and was certainly so, had he not been saved by the differences which, happily for him, subsisted between Essex and Waller, by the former taking upon him to prosecute the expedition to the West, which had been allotted to Waller, and ordering him to pursue Charles. Waller complained bitterly of Essex thus usurping his command, and produced his orders from the committees of both kingdoms (for the Scots were now indulged with having a committee in the English parliament, to act in conjunction with their friends there); but Essex was absolute, and threatened to try Waller by a council of war, if he should disobey. While they were debating this point, Charles got full two days march of the parliament army, and had reached

Worcester; but fearing to be shut up there by Waller, who by this time, was got as far as Evesham in pursuit of him; he went west with his army to Bewdly, as if he had intended to gain Shrewsbury, were it was practicable for him to have joined prince Rupert. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, moved towards Broomsgrove and Kidderminster, and, extending his quarters all along the east side, by degrees got between Charles and the town of Shrewsbury. By this he did the very thing which Charles wished for; for he immediately returned to Worcester, and from thence to Evesham, breaking down the bridges as he passed along, by which means he left Waller two days march behind him, in a heavy country. Upon his coming to Evesham he punished some of its magistrates for their so readily admitting Waller into that place, and marched that same day towards Camden; from whence he sent to his friends in Oxford, where he had left most of his foot in garrison, to meet him with his cannon and infantry, being determined to fight Waller if he should come up. In a few hours he was joined by his forces from Oxford, and then went in quest of Waller, in his turn. On the twenty-ninth of June the two armies approached each other at Cropedy bridge, and were only divided by the Charwell. Next day the king dislodged and proceeded towards Daven-try. Waller ordered a large detachment to cross the bridge, and attack the rear of the royalists. They were repulsed, routed, and chased to a considerable distance. Stunned and discouraged by this blow, his troops began to desert in great numbers; and the king thought he might safely leave them, and march westward against Essex.

Five days after the fight of Cropedy bridge, the king, being at Evesham, caused to be drawn up a message for peace, to both houses of parliament; a copy whereof was sent to the earl of Essex by the marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver, if required. This message, directed "To the Lords and Commons of Parliament, assembled at Westminster," contained a general offer to treat of peace; and if commissioners should be sent to him, he would grant them a safe-conduct. The two houses, ever jealous of the king, thought there was some artifice concealed in sending them only a copy of his message, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent; besides, they did not conceive themselves to be owned, by the direction of the message, as the two houses of parliament; and therefore imagined the king had a mind to reserve to himself the power of saying he did not acknowledge them for the true parliament of England; and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, since he had published the fore-mentioned declaration against them: wherefore they resolved to take no notice of the message, nor return any answer.

Essex having compelled prince Maurice, who commanded the king's forces in the West, to abandon the siege of Lyme, and having reduced Weymouth and Taunton, proceeded still in his conquests without meeting with any interruption; but hearing that the king was marching into the West against him, he retired into Cornwall, and sent to the parliament, desiring them to dispatch an army to attack the king in the rear. General

Middleton was sent with a good body of troops, for that purpose; but arrived too late to do any effectual service. On the first of August, the king entered Cornwall, where he was joined by prince Maurice with his army; and now Essex saw himself cooped up in a narrow corner, at Lestwithiel; destitute of forage and provision, and despairing of all hopes of relief, he was reduced to the last extremity. The king pressed him on one side; prince Maurice on another; sir Richard Grenville on a third. On the thirty-first of August, Essex, Robarts, and some of the principal officers, got on board a boat, and fled to Plymouth: Balfour with his cavalry escaped the king's guards in a thick mist, and arrived safely at the garrisons of his own party. The infantry, under major-general Skippon were obliged to surrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and, being led to the parliamentary quarters, were set at liberty.

By this time the earl (now created marquis) of Montrose, was very successful for the king in Scotland, having obtained a great victory over the Covenanters upon Newbiggin Moor, and taken Perth; and within fourteen days after that, he gained another victory near Aberdeen, soon after took that city, and marched from thence into the earl of Argyll's country, which he wasted with fire and sword, and performed many great services, even to admiration considering the smallness of his beginning, and the little assistance he had from England. But we shall leave a while the narrative of his fortune, to return to the transactions in England, which were, the remaining part of this year, prosecuted in several places with various success. In the West, after the great victory over Essex's army, Ilfracomb, Branstaple, and Saltash submitted to the king's arms; and Basing-house, which had been eighteen weeks besieged, was relieved by a party from Oxford, under sir Henry Gage: and a little after, he, with the earl of Northampton, raised the siege of Banbury castle, which had been a month invested by colonel Fiennes, and slew and took many of his men and one piece of ordnance. But the good fortune of the parliament in several parts balanced this success with advantage: Monmouth was, in September, taken by colonel Massey; and the town and castle of Newcastle, which had long sustained the utmost efforts of the English and Scottish armies, was taken by storm, to the great loss of the assailants, on the twenty-seventh of October; and a while after Liverpool, in Lancashire, was surrendered to sir John Meldrum. But the great business that concluded this year were the important battle of Newbury and the treaty at Uxbridge, which will come next to be related, interwoven with some other of the most remarkable occurrences that then happened.

Though the earl of Essex might have been justly upbraided for the two errors he had committed, in obstinately pursuing his march into the West, contrary to the orders of both houses, and preposterously going into Cornwall, he was not insulted for his misfortunes, but, at his return, was very civilly received: it was then no proper time to examine his conduct, the point was to recruit and arm his ruined army, as well as that of Waller; and accordingly both houses applied themselves to it with all possible diligence. They ordered also colonel Middleton to repair speedily to the earl of Essex's army, and the earl of Manchester to march the same way with his forces. On the twenty-first of October the three armies joined, and were far superior to that of the king, who was by this time come out of the West, and was advanced as far as Newbury, while the parliament forces lay at Reading. Essex, either through disgust or indispotion, or both, absented himself, on the twenty-third from the parliament army, and there was little or no unanimity in their counsels: however, the proximity of the opposite armies would not permit them to be long inactive; and on the twenty-seventh of October was fought the second battle of Newbury, one of the most obstinate that had happened during the whole course of this war. The royalists were defeated: the loss on Charles's side, however, was not very considerable; the parliament lost about a thousand men. After the battle the king retreated to Wallingford, from whence he marched to Bath, near which place he was joined by prince Rupert, and then they put their troops into winter-quarters, as did the parliament on their side.

Oliver Cromwell, who had already signalized himself by several acts of extraordinary valour, was a great instrument of gaining the late advantage over the king's army. It is said, that at this battle of Newbury, the corps, commanded by the earl of Manchester, having given way, the earl likewise being carried along with the rest in their precipitate flight, Cromwell, who was himself wounded, rode up to him, and cried "You are mistaken, my lord, the enemy is not this way," and immediately brought him back to the charge: in a word, most writers agree, that the fortune of this day was chiefly owing to Cromwell. This is certain, that Cromwell had as much influence in the house of commons as he had reputation in the army; and publicly accused his general of not having done his duty.

While these things were transacting, the queen retired into France; and the elector Palatine, who had withdrawn to Holland in the beginning of the troubles between the king (his uncle) and the parliament, came over in the month of August, and put himself under the protection of the parliament; the king hearing of it, wrote to him, to know the reason of so extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what answer the elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to subsist, and considering the king (his uncle) was not able to maintain him, he believed he should find more assistance in the parliament, which had ever expressed a great affection for his house. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the parliament granted him an honourable pension, which was more regularly paid than the former from the king. He afterwards desired, and obtained leave, to hear the debates in the assembly of the divines: probably, he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, but sought to spend his time in conversing with the learned, and improving himself in matters of religion.

Amongst the many tentatives for peace this summer, one was made by the States General, whose ambassadors came to London about the sixth of July. Upon their arrival, they wrote (being three in number, Boreel, de Reede, and Joachimim) to the speaker of the house of commons, to demand an immediate audience in full parliament. As they had addressed the letter to him as speaker of the commons of England, and as their credentials ran in the same stile, the commons were so well pleased, that they ordered them a very splendid introduction, with no less than ten coaches to attend them to both houses, and in their audience they offered the mediation of their masters between the king and his parliament: at the same time, they complained of the detention of some of their ships by those of the parliament; and the whole, after a very ceremonious audience, was referred to a committee of both houses. Those maritime differences seem to have been very complicated, and of so great importance, that neither side chose to proceed, at this time, in the mediation, till they were previously settled.

The fondness of the English for every thing new or strange, brought to light, the latter end of this year, a new scheme of a most extraordinary nature, and which perfectly explained Cromwell's true character, and proved at once the source of his greatness, the downfall of the parliament and hierarchy, the murder of the king, and the abolition of monarchy. The sect of independents began now to make some noise*. The most violent of the presbyterians had joined this sect, which resembled that of the quakers, in condemning the ordination of ministers, and allowing every one to preach and expound the scriptures according to the talents he had received from nature; but they were at the same time as turbulent as the quakers were mild and peaceable. They gave a loose to the wildest imaginations they had formed, the extravagant design of levelling all distinctions among men, and, in order to establish this projected equality, they had recourse to force, which ever implies a superiority on the one side. Oliver Cromwell looked upon these people as fit instruments to be made use of in the great plan he was mediating.

The city of London, which was divided into several factions, complained bitterly that the parliament had loaded it with all the burthen of the

* The independents, called at first congregationalists, owed their rise chiefly to Goodwin, Nye, Bridge, Sympton, and Burroughs; who transported themselves into Holland, for liberty of conscience; from whence, upon the downfall of episcopacy, they returned to England, and addressed the parliament with an apologetical narrative for indisturbance and toleration. In this apology they declare, That they consulted the scriptures without any prepossession; they look upon the word of Christ as impartially and unprejudicedly, as men of flesh and blood are like to do at any juncture of time they having no temptation to any bias; as to church government, they said they confined themselves to scripture precept and precedent, leaving room for alterations upon farther enquiry. Pursuant to these grounds, they held a middle course, between presbyterianism and Brownism; the first they counted too arbitrary, the other too loose. Their main characteristic was the war; and not only so, but that they had of late greatly neglected the city. This circumstance occasioned some warm debates in the house of commons; and Cromwell took the opportunity to expose, with great freedom, the licentiousness and ill government of the army, the officers of which, he said, could not well be called to an account, by reason that most of them were members of the house of commons. He then made a motion for taking into consideration the new modelling the army; in which he was warmly seconded by Sir Harry Vane, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, the solicitor-general, all of them furious independents. In order to effect this scheme, it was proposed that the members of both houses should resign all their employments, civil and military. Almost all the offices of profit were in the hands of the members of one or the other house; the three generals of the parliament's army were peers*; the greatest part of the colonels, majors, the treasurers, the purveyors, and commissioners of all departments, were members of the lower-house. How improbable then did it appear, that so many persons in power could be prevailed upon, by the soothing of a religious cant, to resign their posts and incomes; and yet this was effected in a very short space of time: the commons, in particular, were dazzled with the prospect of gaining an ascendancy over the minds of the people, by this rare example of disinterestedness. The lords, at first, refused to concur in passing the bill, but were soon overpowered by the commons; and on the nineteenth of December, this year, was passed the act called, the Self-denying Ordinance, by which the members of either house were deprived of all offices whether civil or military, except a few, which were particularly mentioned. The earls of Essex, Denbigh, Manchester, and the lord Fairfax, finding they could not stem the torrent, voluntarily resigned their commands; and the army, being augmented to twenty-two thousand men, the chief command was bestowed on sir Thomas Fairfax, he not being a member of parliament.

This was just what Cromwell wanted; he had an absolute ascendancy over this new general, as indeed he had over the whole house of commons, who continued him in the command of his regiment, notwithstanding he was a member; and even ordered the general to give him the command of a detachment of horse, which was directed to march to Oxford. This very man, who had so artfully deprived all the presbyterian members of their military employments, had likewise the address to get the independent party continued in their posts; and thus the latter, though much inferior in number, obtained a complete victory over the presbyterians; and from that time it was easy to perceive that the army could give law to the parliament; for though the power of the sword was, in appearance, conferred on Fairfax, in reality it rested with Cromwell. By his assistance Fairfax new modelled his whole army, incorporated some regiments into others, made a total change in all the military departments, and established a new discipline. All this, which at any other time would have excited a revolt, now passed without the least resistance.

In the mean time, a treaty of peace was begun and carried on between the king and parliament, but with little hopes of success. Upon his majesty's return to Oxford, after putting his army in winter quarters, the two houses required and procured a safe-conduct for their deputies, with proposals of accommodation, which they had framed in the summer. Charles, on their being presented to him, required, in his turn, a safe-conduct for the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton, who should carry his answer to the two houses; but this favour he could not obtain, until he had addressed himself to them by the title of The two Houses of Parliament assembled at Westminster, and to the Scottish Commissioners. On this occasion, Charles employed an artifice which does no honour to his sincerity, and which his warmest advocates will find it difficult to justify or excuse. He entered a secret protest in his council-book, importing, that though he had called them a parliament, he did not acknowledge them as such. This spirit of equivocation had always brought ruin upon Charles's affairs, and was indeed shameful. On the nineteenth of December, the parliament and the Scottish commissioners returned their answer to the king, in which they consented to a treaty. Uxbridge, a town betwixt London and Oxford, was named for the place of treaty, and Charles, on his part, appointed the following commissioners: the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earl of Southampton, the earl of Kingston, the earl of Chichester, the lord Capel, the lord Seymour, the lord Hatton, the lord Culpepper, secretary Nicholas, Mr. chancellor of the Exchequer, sir Edward Hyde, the lord chief-baron, sir Edward Lane, sir Orlando Bridgeman, sir Thomas Gardiner, Mr. Joseph Ashburnham, Mr. Geoffery Palmer, Dr. Steuart, and their attendants; in all, the number of one hundred and eight. The commissioners for the parliament were, Algernon earl of Northumberland, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, William earl of Salisbury, Basil earl of Denbigh, Thomas lord viscount Wenman, Denzil Holles, William Peirpoint, sir Henry Vane, junior, Oliver St. John, Bulstrode Whitlock, John Crew, and Edward Prideaux, for the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, at Westminster; and John earl of Loudon, lord chancellor of Scotland, Archibald marquis of Argyll, John lord Maitland, John lord Balmerino, sir Archibald Johnson, sir Charles Erskine, George Dundas, sir Joseph Smith, sir Hugh Kennedy, and Mr. Robert Berkley, for the estates of the parliament of Scotland, together with Mr. Alexander Henderson.

The conferences were opened on the thirtieth of January, 1645; by mutual agreement they were to last twenty days; and the propositions were reduced to the three articles, of religion, the militia, and Ireland. The propositions offered by the two houses were no other than the most severe conditions they could have imposed upon a prince, whom they intended to strip of all the power, and indeed of all the ensigns, of royalty. In a word, they demanded that the hierarchy should be abolished, and presbyterianism established in both kingdoms; that the king should subscribe the covenant; abandon his best friends as traitors; give up the militia, and even his own children, to the direction of the two houses; which engrossed the whole sovereign authority. Though no peace was to be expected from such proposals, the king's commissioners, in the course of the conferences, agreed that every person should enjoy liberty of conscience touching the ceremonies of the church; that no bishop should exercise any sort of jurisdiction; that no person should be admitted into holy orders without the consent of the presbytery; that episcopal jurisdiction, with respect to marriages and wills, should be regulated by the king and the two houses; that proper laws should be enacted for the regulation of episcopal visitations, the expence of ecclesiastical suits, frivolous excommunications, and other abuses of the spiritual courts; that the militia should be put into the hands of twenty commissioners, one-half to be named by the king, and the other by the two houses; and, that the commission should continue for three years. These concessions were deemed not satisfactory by the two houses: nothing material was proposed relating to the affairs of Ireland, and the twenty days being expired, the conferences broke up without having produced any prospect of accommodation.

The disposition of the forces on both sides, at the beginning of the year 1645, was as follows: part of the Scottish army was engaged in reducing Pomfret, and other towns in Yorkshire; part of it invested Carlisle, bravely defended by sir Thomas Glenham. Chester, where Byron commanded, had been long besieged by sir William Brereton, and was now almost on the point of surrendering. The king, reinforced by the princes Rupert and Maurice, lay at Oxford, with an army of fifteen thousand men. Fairfax and Cromwell were stationed at Windsor, with the new-modelled army of twenty-two thousand men. Taunton, in the county of Somerset, defended by Blake, sustained a long siege from sir Richard Grenville, who headed an army of eight thousand men; and though the defence had been very vigorous, the garrison was now destitute of almost every necessary. Goring, in the West, conducted an army of nearly the same number.

The parliament's army was by this time new modelled according to the plan of Cromwell, and was composed entirely of a set of fanatics, inspired with that blaze of enthusiasm which makes men fight with the most eager zeal, even in the worst of causes, and die in full confidence of obtaining the crown of martyrdom. It was with a detachment of such warriors that Cromwell marched from Windsor, on the twenty-fourth day of April. In the neighbourhood of Islip, he cut in pieces four regiments of the king's cavalry; Buckingham was surrendered to him, at the first summons, by colonel Windebank (son to the secretary of that name), who was thereupon tried by a court-martial, and shot for cowardice; but Cromwell was repulsed in his attack upon Farringdon. Taunton, besieged by sir Richard Grenville, was relieved by colonel Welden, one of the parliament's officers, with a body of horse and foot; but sir Richard, being afterwards reinforced by a strong party under Goring, he resumed his operations against the place, in which the detachment under Welden was now shut up. The king opened the campaign on his side, by marching with about eight thousand men towards Chester, to relieve that place, besieged by sir William Brereton; but hearing by the way the siege was raised, he marched to Leicester, which he took by storm, on the thirtieth of May. Here Charles received advice, that Fairfax was ordered to besiege Oxford; he therefore marched to Harborough, where he was informed that general had abandoned his design upon Oxford, and had been repulsed with great loss in assaulting the garrison of Borstal-house (in Buckinghamshire). The king continued his march, in expectation of being joined by colonel Gerard, with two thousand men from Wales; as well as by Goring, at the head of three thousand cavalry. In this situation of affairs, prudence seemed to dictate the waiting for the coming up of these supplies, and, till then, to act only on the defensive; but the head-strong and impetuous temper of prince Rupert, and the fiery and impatient humour of the young nobility under Charles, rendered fruitless the advice of the more grave and experienced officers of the council; and it was resolved, by a majority of voices in the cabinet, to attack Fairfax. The royal army accordingly marched back; and, on the fourteenth day of June, came in sight of the enemy, who were drawn up in order of battle, on a rising ground in the neighbourhood of Naseby, a village near Rothwell, in Northamptonshire.

At this place was fought, with forces nearly equal, that great and important battle between the king and parliament. The main body of the royalists was headed by the king, the right wing by prince Rupert, the left by sir Marmaduke Langdale. Fairfax, assisted by Skippon, commanded the main body of the parliamentarians; Cromwell conducted the right wing: Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, the left. The charge was begun by prince Rupert, with his usual impetuosity, and his usual success: notwithstanding the brave resistance of Ireton, who, even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, still continued to fight with undaunted courage, till he was taken prisoner, that whole wing was totally broke, and chased to a considerable distance by Rupert: he was even so imprudent as to waste time in attacking the artillery of the parliament, which had been left behind with a strong guard of infantry. Mean while the king, at the head of his main body, attacked Fairfax and Skippon; and the fight was, for some time, maintained with equal bravery on both sides. Skippon, being dangerously wounded, was desired by Fairfax to quit the field; but declared he would not retire so long as one man kept his ground. At last the infantry of the parliament was thrown into disorder, and hard pushed by the king; till Fairfax, with great prudence, brought up the reserve, and restored the battle. By this time Cromwell, with his right wing, having fallen upon Langdale, had repulsed the royalists, and by his conduct improved that advantage, which he had obtained by his valour. Having chased the enemy about a quarter of a mile, and detached some troops to continue the pursuit, he turned back upon the king's infantry; and, at the first onset, threw them into the utmost confusion. One regiment alone, though twice assaulted by Fairfax, still maintained its ranks unbroken; and that general, provoked at so stubborn a resistance, commanded Doyley, the captain of his life-guards, to assail them once more in front, while he himself attacked attacked them in rear. By these united efforts the regiment was broke. Fairfax, with his own hands, slew an ensign, and having taken the colours, gave them to a soldier to keep for him. The soldier afterwards pretending that he had gained the spoil himself, was reprimanded by Doyley, who had seen the action: "Let him retain that honour (said Fairfax) I have to-day acquired enough beside."

Prince Rupert, convinced too late of his error, abandoned the fruitless attack on the enemy's artillery, and returned to the king, whose infantry was now totally defeated. Charles endeavoured to animate this body of cavalry to a fresh attack, and cried aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But the danger of such an attempt was too great and apparent; and they could by no means be persuaded to renew the battle. At the same time, the Scottish earl of Carnwarth, who rode by his majesty's side, seizing the bridle of his horse, turned him round, saying, "Will you go upon your death in an instant." The troops seeing this motion, wheeled off to the right, and immediately fled with the utmost precipitation. Charles, finding it impossible to make any farther resistance, was obliged to quit the field, and abandon the victory to his enemies. The number of killed on the side of the parliament was greater than on the side of the king: they lost a thousand men; he not above eight hundred. But Fairfax took five hundred officers, and four thousand private men, prisoners; seized all the king's artillery and baggage, and totally dispersed his infantry: so that no victory could be well more complete, than that which was now obtained by the parliament.*

It would be as irksome as improper, in this history, to enter upon a detail of all the little actions and skirmishes, the sieges of castles, and the taking of houses, that happened during this active year. Let it suffice then to inform the reader, that Charles, having escaped from the fatal field of Naseby, gathered together some part of his scattered forces, but never was able to make head against the conquerors; losing this year one garrison after another, till his whole strength was almost reduced to Oxford. We shall only mention some of the principal places taken from him by the victorious parliamentarians, namely, Leicester, Carlisle, Pomfret castle, Bridgewater, Scarborough, Hereford, West Chester, and Bristol; on which a great part of his affairs chiefly depended. This latter place was well supplied with men, provisions, and ammunition; and every body concluded, from the known valour of prince Rupert, that he would make a very vigorous defence. He even wrote to the king, that he should be able to hold out four months, unless mutiny should compel him to surrender. Notwithstanding this promise, and the general expectation, he offered to capitulate at the first summons; and actually delivered up the place before the besiegers had begun to make their approaches. The unhappy monarch, in the first transports of his grief, ordered his nephew to quit the kingdom, and revoked all his commissions.

During these transactions, the unfortunate king underwent a surprising series of dangers, mortifications, and distresses, which he bore with uncommon fortitude and dignity. Amongst his other misfortune was that of losing his cabinet of papers, which was taken from the lord Digby, in an engagement near Newark, and sent up to the parliament; and from which they made great discoveries to the king's prejudice. It was no little aggravation to the calamities which Charles suffered, that his forlorn estate encouraged some of his principal officers to forget all respect to the person of their general and their sovereign; of which the following is a melancholy instance. While Charles lay at Newark, on his march back to Oxford, prince Rupert and prince Maurice, with a train of their friends and officers, contrary to the express orders of Charles, came to that town, and even forced their way into his presence, with an intention that prince Rupert might be cleared for the surrender of Bristol. Charles thought proper to suffer a council of war to acquit him both of cowardice and treachery; but as he behaved to the prince with great coldness, the latter entered into a conspiracy with sir Richard Willis, the governor of Newark, who was so extremely disagreeable to the gentlemen of the county, that Charles was forced to give his government to the lord Bellasis. Though Charles was so far from intending this as any affront to Willis, that he had appointed him to command his life-guards, in the room of the earl of Litchfield, who had been killed at Chester; yet, it was so far resented by him, the two princes, and all his friends, that they broke into the king's bed-chamber in a body, and demanded public reparation for the injury that had been done to Willis, in taking from him his command. Charles behaved on this occasion with so great spirit and presence of mind, that the mutineers were ashamed of what they had done, and left his presence covered with confusion. Charles, next day sent them passes, to carry them wheresoever they would go. After their departure, he put in execution an admirable plan: he had formed his retreat to Oxford, at which city he arrived, through infinite dangers and difficulties, in the beginning of November.

The year 1646 began as unfortunately for Charles as the preceding one had concluded. After the reduction of Bristol, Fairfax and Cromwell having divided their forces, the former marched westward, in order to finish the conquest of Devonshire and Cornwall, where the prince of Wales commanded the royal forces. After a rapid and uninterrupted success, during which he twice obliged the prince of Wales to retreat before him, he at length obtained a complete victory over the lord Hopton, at Farrington, on the tenth of February; and, pushing that nobleman in his retreat, he improved the advantage he had gained, cooped up the royalists in Truro, and compelled the whole army, amounting to five thousand men, chiefly cavalry, to surrender, on the fourteenth of March, upon terms: then laying siege to Exeter, he obliged that city to capitulate on the ninth of April. This finished the conquest of the West. And the victorious Fairfax returned with his army to the center of the kingdom, and pitched his camp at Newbury. The king, seeing his affairs irretrievably ruined, wrote to the prince of Wales, to consult his own safety by flying the kingdom; and accordingly the young prince withdrew to Scilly, then to Jersey, from whence he went to Paris, where he found the queen his mother, who had escaped thither from Exeter, at the time the earl of Essex first led the parliamentary forces into the West.

* Hume's History of Great Britain, vol. i. reign of Charles I.

In the mean while, Montrose, who acted for the king in Scotland, having penetrated into the southern counties, the covenanters, having collected their whole force, opposed him with a numerous army, and gave him battle at Kilsyth, but without success. This was the most important victory which Montrose ever gained. The royalists killed above six thousand of their enemies, and left them no appearance of an army in Scotland. The whole kingdom was rent with these repeated convulsions; and many noblemen, who were secretly attached to the royal cause, now espoused it openly, when they saw a force able to support them. The marquis of Douglas, the earls of Anandale and Hartfield, the lords Fleming, Seton, Maderty, Carnegy, with many others, immediately joined the royal army: Edinburgh opened its gates to them, and released all the prisoners whom the covenanters had confined in that city: amongst the rest was the lord Ogilvy, son to Airlie, whose family had a principal share in the victory gained at Kilsyth.

The covenanters, alarmed at the rapid progress of Montrose, recalled David Lesley from the army in England; and this able general immediately repaired to the relief of his distressed friends in Scotland. Montrose continued to penetrate still farther into the southern provinces, encouraged by the vain hopes of exciting to arms the earls of Hume, Traquair, and Roxborough, who had engaged to assist him, and of procuring from England some supplies of cavalry, which he much wanted: but Lesley, at Philip-hough, in the Forest, came suddenly upon him, and obliged him to give battle. After a sharp conflict, in which Montrose performed the most heroic acts of valour, his troops were entirely defeated by Lesley's cavalry, and he himself forced to fly, with the scattered remains of his army, into the mountains; where he again prepared himself for attempting some new enterprize.

After all these repeated calamities, which every where befel the royal party, there remained only one body of troops on which fortune could exercise her cruelty. Lord Astley, with a small army of three thousand men, chiefly cavalry, was advancing to Oxford, in order to reinforce the king; when he was encountered, at a place called Donnington, near Stow on the Would, on the twenty-first of March, by colonel Morgan, by whom he was entirely routed, and himself taken prisoner; and, with him, all the king's hopes of preserving Oxford, till he could better his condition, were lost.

It is now time to see what passed in the Scottish army, whilst the parliament forces were employed in reducing the places which held for the king in the southern and western parts of the kingdom. The Scots, having taken Newcastle in October, 1644, divided themselves into two bodies, one whereof besieged Carlisle, which surrendered upon articles in June, 1645.

The other part of the army durst not engage in a siege, because the marquis of Montrose, who served the king in Scotland, having had great success there, it was to be feared the king would be sending him reinforcements; wherefore the Scots always kept in a readiness to oppose it. This became still more necessary after the battle of Naseby; there being great likelihood of the king's resolving to join the earl of Montrose with his cavalry. Besides, the Scots, by keeping thus in the middle of the kingdom, prevented the king from making new levies in those parts. At last, after the taking of Carlisle, the two bodies being joined, they besieged Hereford, about the end of July; but, after having in vain carried on the siege above a month, they raised it in the beginning of September. The earl of Leven, their general, published, upon this occasion, a sort of apology, wherein, amongst other things, he said, that for six or seven months past, they had received but one month's pay; that they had been promised to be supplied with all things necessary for a siege; in which they had been extremely disappointed, since they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty balls to each; that they had but few horse; and being informed the king was marching towards them with three thousand horse, it was impossible to continue the siege. Lastly, that general Lesley was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of horse and dragoons, to oppose Montrose.

After the siege of Hereford was raised, the Scotch army retired into Yorkshire, complaining pretty openly of being entirely neglected; whereupon the parliament assigned them thirty thousand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark upon the first of November; and ordered that the eastern association should pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to these terms, the siege of Newark was begun about the end of October, 1645, and lasted till May, 1646.

The king, during the whole course of the preceding winter, and great part of this spring, was in the most wretched and deplorable situation; all the attempts which he made for a reasonable accommodation with the parliament, answered no other purpose, than to shew that victory was entirely in their hands, and that they were determined to use it as conquerors. From the fifteenth of December to the twenty-third of March following, Charles had sent nine or ten messages to the parliament, with offers of peace; and for the better accomplishment thereof, he even proposed to have a personal treaty with them at Westminster. At last, on the thirtieth of March, a message came to him from the parliament, in which they told him, "That it would be unsafe for him then to return to Westminster, until he had assented to the propositions which they were framing," &c. And, to prevent his coming to London without their knowledge and consent, they voted, "That if the king should come, or attempt to come, within the lines of communication, that then the committee of the militia of London should have power, and were thereby enjoined, to apprehend and secure such as should come with him, to prevent resort unto him, and to secure his person."

Fairfax was all this time advancing with a numerous army, and, it was well known, with an intention to form the siege of Oxford, which must of necessity fall into his hands. In this most dreadful situation, no wonder that he embraced a measure which at any other time would have been looked upon as foolish or imprudent. Monsieur Montreuil, the French ambassador, had always espoused the king's interest with all the warmth of humanity that his station would admit; he had lately founded the Scottish generals and commissioners, who were greatly disgusted at the treatment they had met with from the parliament; and as the presbyterians were great enemies to the independent party, who now assumed the management of all affairs, he had received many general promises and professions of their affection to their distressed sovereign, and their inclination to protect him, if he thought fit to place his confidence in them. In consequence of the report of Montreuil, and by his earnest advice, Charles was induced to adopt the resolution of quitting Oxford, and repairing to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. Accordingly, on the night of the twenty-seventh of April, this year, he left Oxford in disguise, attended by Mr. Ashburnham, and one Hudson, a clergyman, who knew the bye ways; and after travelling, in the garb of their servant, a great deal of the country, he arrived, on the fifth of May, at the Scottish camp.

The Scottish generals and commissioners were confounded at the sudden appearance of his majesty; they, however, behaved as well as could be expected. The earl of Leven received him respectfully; and general Pointz, who commanded the English forces before Newark, was so apprehensive of their intentions, that he cut off the communication between his and the Scottish camp. The Scottish commissioners, however, were excessively puzzled how to behave; but, at last, they resolved to join in a letter with the earl of Leven, informing the parliament of the king's being in their hands. The parliament, before they received this letter, or another from Pointz, to the same purpose, knew of the king's escape from Oxford, but being ignorant how he directed his course, they passed several severe votes against concealing his person, and against all his party who should be found within the lines of circumvallation about London.

Charles had little reason to be satisfied with his condition; he was so narrowly watched, under the shew of respectful attendance on his person, that not one of his friends could get to the speech of him in private. The Scottish generals represented to him, that it would be proper, for the safety of his person, for the army to remove farther North, and that as this could not be done before the reduction of Newark, they desired him to order that town to surrender. The king, persuaded by this reason, gave orders to lord Bellasis, the governor, to surrender; which was accordingly done, on the ninth of May; and then the Scottish army decamped, and marched with the king to Newcastle. Here they desired him to send orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, both in England and Scotland, to submit to the parliament; and the king, conscious that it was in vain to make any resistance, readily complied with their request. His orders were readily obeyed; and thus was concluded a most cruel war, which had now continued almost four years, during which, the British nations had been engaged, by their civil and religious quarrels, in shedding the blood of their friends and relations, and in wasting and destroying their native country.

We must not forget to mention, that Montrose, after a variety of other attempts, in which he sometimes failed, and sometimes succeeded, threw down his arms and abandoned the kingdom.

I shall not here trouble the reader with the numerous manifestos and declarations that passed between the Scottish army and the parliament, on the subject of the king; nor their disputes about the disposal of his person; nor with the repeated concessions of the latter towards bringing his rebellious subjects to some equitable terms, for restoring the tranquility of the nation, which were as often rejected with the most inexcusable insolence on the part of the independents, now the prevailing faction in both houses: I shall only observe, that the life of the unfortunate Charles now hurried to its catastrophe.

As the Scots agreed with the parliament in enforcing all the severe conditions they required of the king, it is not probable that they ever really intended to set him at liberty; nor indeed, had they been so inclined, could they have carried their scheme into execution: they therefore resolved to deliver him up to his English subjects, but not, however till they had obtained those arrears to which they laid claim, and which they were not likely, in the present situation of affairs, to procure by any other expedient. After much debate and controversy, concerning the demands of the Scots, which were very exorbitant, it was agreed by the house of commons to give them four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid immediately, and the other within a twelvemonth. This agreement, which was accepted on the part of the Scots, passed the house on the sixteenth of December, by a majority of one hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and one; for the independents opposed every vote for getting rid of the Scots by way of treaty, adopting the maxim of Camillus, the Roman general, that it was for the dignity of their country to drive out an unwelcome guest rather by steel than by gold. Matters being thus compromised between the Scots and the English, and the first payment of the money being made at Newcastle, according to the compact, the former delivered the royal captive, on the thirtieth of January, to the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montagu, sir James Harrington, sir John Holland, sir Walter Erle, sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and major-general Brown, who were appointed by the parliament their commissioners to receive him. The two houses had voted that his majesty should reside at his house at Holmby, in the county of Northampton, where he arrived on the sixteenth of February, 1647. The commissioners had instructions to keep the king close prisoner, and to send to Fairfax for what forces were necessary for that purpose. All this was opposed by the independents, who wanted that he should, without any other ceremony, be delivered up to Skippon. His majesty was allowed no more than nine servants, and those of the parliament's choosing, to attend him: he was treated by the commissioners and sir Thomas Fairfax, who escorted him from Newcastle to Holmby, with all the marks of outward respect; but very strict care was taken to deprive him of all intercourse with his friends, which

Charles often attempted privately, but was as often disappointed by the vigilance of the committee. The parliament of Scotland sent up a declaration consenting to his residing at Holmby, or in any other of his houses near London, "provided (say they) no violence should be offered to his person; that no new change should be made in the government; and that his posterity should suffer no prejudice in their succession to the throne of England."

The Scots having now completely done their business, marched from Newcastle, which was taken possession of by an English garrison; and shortly after they put Berwick and Carlisle into the parliament's hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

All the writers in the royal cause have represented this transaction of the Scots as highly injurious to the character of that nation, as if they had sold their king to his inveterate enemies, and bargained the life of their sovereign for money. That the delivery of this ill-fated prince to the two houses was a private stipulation between them and the English parliament, is scarce to be questioned: that it was criminal in the Scots, must in some measure be allowed; but the candour and impartiality which ought ever to be the guide of the historian, obliges me to observe, that what has chiefly rendered this measure odious, are the fatal consequences with which it was at last attended; and that it ought to be remembered, that these consequences were neither natural nor necessary, nor, indeed, at this time probable: neither the Scots, nor the majority of the English parliament themselves had the least intention of proceeding to the violent extremities which were afterwards pursued. It was, as a modern writer* very justly observes, the independents, determined enemies both to the king, the parliament, and the Scots, who twice seized the king by force, and at last brought him to a cruel and ignominious death, at the very time when the Scots and the presbyterians, which latter now composed the majority in parliament, were exerting their utmost endeavours, and even risking their lives and fortunes by rising in arms, in order to restore him to his throne.

Pitiable indeed was now the condition of the fallen Charles, and of his family. His queen was in France; his eldest son, after being a vagabond between Cornwall, Jersey, and Scilly, had been delivered into the hands of the same perfidious neighbours; his second and third sons (the dukes of York and Gloucester), with the princess Henrietta, his youngest daughter, were prisoners in London, subsisting on a scanty pension allowed them by their enemies: the princes Rupert and Maurice, after leaving Newark, wandered from place to place, ashamed of abandoning their uncle and generous benefactor, and retired to Oxford, where they had the benefit of the capitulation of that city, and retired beyond sea. He himself was immured by the detested rebels; denied all the comforts of this life, and even that which his soul most loved, the exercise of religion according to his own faith; for we are told, that not any of his chaplains were suffered to have access to him, nor so much as a Common Prayer Book allowed him for his own private use.

During the king's residence in the Scottish camp, died the earl of Essex, the discarded but still popular and powerful general of the parliament. His death at this critical juncture was a great loss to the public, and made it easier for Cromwell to carry on the destructive designs he had concerted; for doubtless, had Essex lived, he would have exerted all his influence and authority, to give a check to the fury that was going to prevail.

The parliament having now the person of the king in their possession, and all his armies and garrisons subdued by their forces, were rioting in the fulness of power: nor could the most frantic among them form a wish which they did not enjoy. But dissention, the never-failing attendant on anarchy and misrule, soon made its way among them, and blasted all their towering prospects.

Cromwell and his independents were now masters of the soldiery, who no longer looked upon themselves as servants to the parliament, but as its lawgivers. Fairfax, who had been the unhappy, and, as far as appears, the unwilling instrument of his country's misery, was not proof against the arts of Cromwell, who, on every occasion, molded him to his purpose. The parliament, though still all powerful in London, had, for some time, been apprehensive that the army was aiming at the supreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of these troublesome servants; an opportunity now seemed to offer, convenient for effecting their design: the troops in almost all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell especially backed their remonstrances with somewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be sent to Ireland; and the presbyterian faction in the house politically suffered them to live at free quarters, that the disbanding them, which was resolved upon, might be less unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears†.

The head-quarters of the army was at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, while these matters were debating in parliament. Cromwell looked upon this as the critical minute for perfecting his great designs: nevertheless he continued to practise the most exquisite dissimulation in the house; he smote his breast; he threw up his eyes; he shed tears; and poured out such a torrent of passionate asseverations concerning his fidelity to the house, the patience and resignation of the army under their oppressions, and the unwearied labours which he and his associates had employed in making them easy, that he imposed even on those who had themselves been thoroughly versed in the same arts: he recommended every severe expedient for repressing the mutiny which now began to encrease among the soldiery; and by these desperate counsels, he at once seemed to prove his own sincerity, and increased those discontents which he proposed to convert to his own advantage. In the mean time he pounds; in all three hundred and thirty-one thousand pounds. See Journ. of the House of Com. March 26. I mention this important particular, because most historians have adopted a wild notion, as if the army without any provocation, had all of a sudden started out in rebellion against the parliament.

ful situation, no wonder that he embraced a measure which at any other time would have been looked upon as foolish or imprudent. Monsieur Montreuil, the French ambassador, had always espoused the king's interest with all the warmth of humanity that his station would admit; he had lately founded the Scottish generals and commissioners, who were greatly disgusted at the treatment they had met with from the parliament; and as the presbyterians were great enemies to the independent party, who now assumed the management of all affairs, he had received many general promises and professions of their affection to their distressed sovereign, and their inclination to protect him, if he thought fit to place his confidence in them. In consequence of the report of Montreuil, and by his earnest advice, Charles was induced to adopt the resolution of quitting Oxford, and repairing to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. Accordingly, on the night of the twenty-seventh of April, this year, he left Oxford in disguise, attended by Mr. Ashburnham, and one Hudson, a clergyman, who knew the bye ways; and after travelling, in the garb of their servant, a great deal of the country, he arrived, on the fifth of May, at the Scottish camp.

The Scottish generals and commissioners were confounded at the sudden appearance of his majesty; they, however, behaved as well as could be expected. The earl of Leven received him respectfully; and general Pointz, who commanded the English forces before Newark, was so apprehensive of their intentions, that he cut off the communication between his and the Scottish camp. The Scottish commissioners, however, were excessively puzzled how to behave; but, at last, they resolved to join in a letter with the earl of Leven, informing the parliament of the king's being in their hands. The parliament, before they received this letter, or another from Pointz, to the same purpose, knew of the king's escape from Oxford, but being ignorant how he directed his course, they passed several severe votes against concealing his person, and against all his party who should be found within the lines of circumvallation about London.

Charles had little reason to be satisfied with his condition; he was so narrowly watched, under the shew of respectful attendance on his person, that not one of his friends could get to the speech of him in private. The Scottish generals represented to him, that it would be proper, for the safety of his person, for the army to remove farther North, and that as this could not be done before the reduction of Newark, they desired him to order that town to surrender. The king, persuaded by this reason, gave orders to lord Bellasis, the governor, to surrender; which was accordingly done, on the ninth of May; and then the Scottish army decamped, and marched with the king to Newcastle. Here they desired him to send orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, both in England and Scotland, to submit to the parliament; and the king, conscious that it was in vain to make any resistance, readily complied with their request. His orders were readily obeyed; and thus was concluded a most cruel war, which had now continued almost four years, during which, the British nations had been engaged, by their civil and religious quarrels, in shedding the blood of their friends and relations, and in wasting and destroying their native country.

We must not forget to mention, that Montrose, after a variety of other attempts, in which he sometimes failed, and sometimes succeeded, threw down his arms and abandoned the kingdom.

I shall not here trouble the reader with the numerous manifestos and declarations that passed between the Scottish army and the parliament, on the subject of the king; nor their disputes about the disposal of his person; nor with the repeated concessions of the latter towards bringing his rebellious subjects to some equitable terms, for restoring the tranquility of the nation, which were as often rejected with the most inexcusable insolence on the part of the independents, now the prevailing faction in both houses: I shall only observe, that the life of the unfortunate Charles now hurried to its catastrophe.

As the Scots agreed with the parliament in enforcing all the severe conditions they required of the king, it is not probable that they ever really intended to set him at liberty; nor indeed, had they been so inclined, could they have carried their scheme into execution: they therefore resolved to deliver him up to his English subjects, but not, however till they had obtained those arrears to which they laid claim, and which they were not likely, in the present situation of affairs, to procure by any other expedient. After much debate and controversy, concerning the demands of the Scots, which were very exorbitant, it was agreed by the house of commons to give them four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid immediately, and the other within a twelvemonth. This agreement, which was accepted on the part of the Scots, passed the house on the sixteenth of December, by a majority of one hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and one; for the independents opposed every vote for getting rid of the Scots by way of treaty, adopting the maxim of Camillus, the Roman general, that it was for the dignity of their country to drive out an unwelcome guest rather by steel than by gold. Matters being thus compromised between the Scots and the English, and the first payment of the money being made at Newcastle, according to the compact, the former delivered the royal captive, on the thirtieth of January, to the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montagu, sir James Harrington, sir John Holland, sir Walter Erle, sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and major-general Brown, who were appointed by the parliament their commissioners to receive him. The two houses had voted that his majesty should reside at his house at Holmby, in the county of Northampton, where he arrived on the sixteenth of February, 1647. The commissioners had instructions to keep the king close prisoner, and to send to Fairfax for what forces were necessary for that purpose. All this was opposed by the independents, who wanted that he should, without any other ceremony, be delivered up to Skippon. His majesty was allowed no more than nine servants, and those of the parliament's choosing, to attend him: he was treated by the commissioners and sir Thomas Fairfax, who escorted him from Newcastle to Holmby, with all the marks of outward respect; but very strict care was taken to deprive him of all intercourse with his friends, which

Charles often attempted privately, but was as often disappointed by the vigilance of the committee. The parliament of Scotland sent up a declaration consenting to his residing at Holmby, or in any other of his houses near London, "provided (say they) no violence should be offered to his person; that no new change should be made in the government; and that his posterity should suffer no prejudice in their succession to the throne of England."

The Scots having now completely done their business, marched from Newcastle, which was taken possession of by an English garrison; and shortly after they put Berwick and Carlisle into the parliament's hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

All the writers in the royal cause have represented this transaction of the Scots as highly injurious to the character of that nation, as if they had sold their king to his inveterate enemies, and bargained the life of their sovereign for money. That the delivery of this ill-fated prince to the two houses was a private stipulation between them and the English parliament, is scarce to be questioned: that it was criminal in the Scots, must in some measure be allowed; but the candour and impartiality which ought ever to be the guide of the historian, obliges me to observe, that what has chiefly rendered this measure odious, are the fatal consequences with which it was at last attended; and that it ought to be remembered, that these consequences were neither natural nor necessary, nor, indeed, at this time probable: neither the Scots, nor the majority of the English parliament themselves had the least intention of proceeding to the violent extremities which were afterwards pursued. It was, as a modern writer* very justly observes, the independents, determined enemies both to the king, the parliament, and the Scots, who twice seized the king by force, and at last brought him to a cruel and ignominious death, at the very time when the Scots and the presbyterians, which latter now composed the majority in parliament, were exerting their utmost endeavours, and even risking their lives and fortunes by rising in arms, in order to restore him to his throne.

Pitiable indeed was now the condition of the fallen Charles, and of his family. His queen was in France; his eldest son, after being a vagabond between Cornwall, Jersey, and Scilly, had been delivered into the hands of the same perfidious neighbours; his second and third sons (the dukes of York and Gloucester), with the princess Henrietta, his youngest daughter, were prisoners in London, subsisting on a scanty pension allowed them by their enemies: the princes Rupert and Maurice, after leaving Newark, wandered from place to place, ashamed of abandoning their uncle and generous benefactor, and retired to Oxford, where they had the benefit of the capitulation of that city, and retired beyond sea. He himself was immured by the detested rebels; denied all the comforts of this life, and even that which his soul most loved, the exercise of religion according to his own faith; for we are told, that not any of his chaplains were suffered to have access to him, nor so much as a Common Prayer Book allowed him for his own private use.

During the king's residence in the Scottish camp, died the earl of Essex, the discarded but still popular and powerful general of the parliament. His death at this critical juncture was a great loss to the public, and made it easier for Cromwell to carry on the destructive designs he had concerted; for doubtless, had Essex lived, he would have exerted all his influence and authority, to give a check to the fury that was going to prevail.

The parliament having now the person of the king in their possession, and all his armies and garrisons subdued by their forces, were rioting in the fulness of power: nor could the most frantic among them form a wish which they did not enjoy. But dissention, the never-failing attendant on anarchy and misrule, soon made its way among them, and blasted all their towering prospects.

Cromwell and his independents were now masters of the soldiery, who no longer looked upon themselves as servants to the parliament, but as its lawgivers. Fairfax, who had been the unhappy, and, as far as appears, the unwilling instrument of his country's misery, was not proof against the arts of Cromwell, who, on every occasion, molded him to his purpose. The parliament, though still all powerful in London, had, for some time, been apprehensive that the army was aiming at the supreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of these troublesome servants; an opportunity now seemed to offer, convenient for effecting their design: the troops in almost all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell especially backed their remonstrances with somewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be sent to Ireland; and the presbyterian faction in the house politically suffered them to live at free quarters, that the disbanding them, which was resolved upon, might be less unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears†.

The head-quarters of the army was at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, while these matters were debating in parliament. Cromwell looked upon this as the critical minute for perfecting his great designs: nevertheless he continued to practise the most exquisite dissimulation in the house; he smote his breast; he threw up his eyes; he shed tears; and poured out such a torrent of passionate asseverations concerning his fidelity to the house, the patience and resignation of the army under their oppressions, and the unwearied labours which he and his associates had employed in making them easy, that he imposed even on those who had themselves been thoroughly versed in the same arts: he recommended every severe expedient for repressing the mutiny which now began to encrease among the soldiery; and by these desperate counsels, he at once seemed to prove his own sincerity, and increased those discontents which he proposed to convert to his own advantage. In the mean time he

The parliament, though still all powerful in London, had, for some time, been apprehensive that the army was aiming at the supreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of these troublesome servants; an opportunity now seemed to offer, convenient for effecting their design: the troops in almost all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell especially backed their remonstrances with somewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be sent to Ireland; and the presbyterian faction in the house politically suffered them to live at free quarters, that the disbanding them, which was resolved upon, might be less unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears†.

The head-quarters of the army was at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, while these matters were debating in parliament. Cromwell looked upon this as the critical minute for perfecting his great designs: nevertheless he continued to practise the most exquisite dissimulation in the house; he smote his breast; he threw up his eyes; he shed tears; and poured out such a torrent of passionate asseverations concerning his fidelity to the house, the patience and resignation of the army under their oppressions, and the unwearied labours which he and his associates had employed in making them easy, that he imposed even on those who had themselves been thoroughly versed in the same arts: he recommended every severe expedient for repressing the mutiny which now began to encrease among the soldiery; and by these desperate counsels, he at once seemed to prove his own sincerity, and increased those discontents which he proposed to convert to his own advantage. ful situation, no wonder that he embraced a measure which at any other time would have been looked upon as foolish or imprudent. Monsieur Montreuil, the French ambassador, had always espoused the king's interest with all the warmth of humanity that his station would admit; he had lately founded the Scottish generals and commissioners, who were greatly disgusted at the treatment they had met with from the parliament; and as the presbyterians were great enemies to the independent party, who now assumed the management of all affairs, he had received many general promises and professions of their affection to their distressed sovereign, and their inclination to protect him, if he thought fit to place his confidence in them. In consequence of the report of Montreuil, and by his earnest advice, Charles was induced to adopt the resolution of quitting Oxford, and repairing to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. Accordingly, on the night of the twenty-seventh of April, this year, he left Oxford in disguise, attended by Mr. Ashburnham, and one Hudson, a clergyman, who knew the bye ways; and after travelling, in the garb of their servant, a great deal of the country, he arrived, on the fifth of May, at the Scottish camp.

The Scottish generals and commissioners were confounded at the sudden appearance of his majesty; they, however, behaved as well as could be expected. The earl of Leven received him respectfully; and general Pointz, who commanded the English forces before Newark, was so apprehensive of their intentions, that he cut off the communication between his and the Scottish camp. The Scottish commissioners, however, were excessively puzzled how to behave; but, at last, they resolved to join in a letter with the earl of Leven, informing the parliament of the king's being in their hands. The parliament, before they received this letter, or another from Pointz, to the same purpose, knew of the king's escape from Oxford, but being ignorant how he directed his course, they passed several severe votes against concealing his person, and against all his party who should be found within the lines of circumvallation about London.

Charles had little reason to be satisfied with his condition; he was so narrowly watched, under the shew of respectful attendance on his person, that not one of his friends could get to the speech of him in private. The Scottish generals represented to him, that it would be proper, for the safety of his person, for the army to remove farther North, and that as this could not be done before the reduction of Newark, they desired him to order that town to surrender. The king, persuaded by this reason, gave orders to lord Bellasis, the governor, to surrender; which was accordingly done, on the ninth of May; and then the Scottish army decamped, and marched with the king to Newcastle. Here they desired him to send orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, both in England and Scotland, to submit to the parliament; and the king, conscious that it was in vain to make any resistance, readily complied with their request. His orders were readily obeyed; and thus was concluded a most cruel war, which had now continued almost four years, during which, the British nations had been engaged, by their civil and religious quarrels, in shedding the blood of their friends and relations, and in wasting and destroying their native country.

We must not forget to mention, that Montrose, after a variety of other attempts, in which he sometimes failed, and sometimes succeeded, threw down his arms and abandoned the kingdom.

I shall not here trouble the reader with the numerous manifestos and declarations that passed between the Scottish army and the parliament, on the subject of the king; nor their disputes about the disposal of his person; nor with the repeated concessions of the latter towards bringing his rebellious subjects to some equitable terms, for restoring the tranquility of the nation, which were as often rejected with the most inexcusable insolence on the part of the independents, now the prevailing faction in both houses: I shall only observe, that the life of the unfortunate Charles now hurried to its catastrophe.

As the Scots agreed with the parliament in enforcing all the severe conditions they required of the king, it is not probable that they ever really intended to set him at liberty; nor indeed, had they been so inclined, could they have carried their scheme into execution: they therefore resolved to deliver him up to his English subjects, but not, however till they had obtained those arrears to which they laid claim, and which they were not likely, in the present situation of affairs, to procure by any other expedient. After much debate and controversy, concerning the demands of the Scots, which were very exorbitant, it was agreed by the house of commons to give them four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid immediately, and the other within a twelvemonth. This agreement, which was accepted on the part of the Scots, passed the house on the sixteenth of December, by a majority of one hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and one; for the independents opposed every vote for getting rid of the Scots by way of treaty, adopting the maxim of Camillus, the Roman general, that it was for the dignity of their country to drive out an unwelcome guest rather by steel than by gold. Matters being thus compromised between the Scots and the English, and the first payment of the money being made at Newcastle, according to the compact, the former delivered the royal captive, on the thirtieth of January, to the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montagu, sir James Harrington, sir John Holland, sir Walter Erle, sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and major-general Brown, who were appointed by the parliament their commissioners to receive him. The two houses had voted that his majesty should reside at his house at Holmby, in the county of Northampton, where he arrived on the sixteenth of February, 1647. The commissioners had instructions to keep the king close prisoner, and to send to Fairfax for what forces were necessary for that purpose. All this was opposed by the independents, who wanted that he should, without any other ceremony, be delivered up to Skippon. His majesty was allowed no more than nine servants, and those of the parliament's chusing, to attend him: he was treated by the commissioners and sir Thomas Fairfax, who escorted him from Newcastle to Holmby, with all the marks of outward respect; but very strict care was taken to deprive him of all intercourse with his friends, which

Charles often attempted privately, but was as often disappointed by the vigilance of the committee. The parliament of Scotland sent up a declaration consenting to his residing at Holmby, or in any other of his houses near London, "provided (say they) no violence should be offered to his person; that no new change should be made in the government; and that his posterity should suffer no prejudice in their succession to the throne of England."

The Scots having now completely done their business, marched from Newcastle, which was taken possession of by an English garrison; and shortly after they put Berwick and Carlisle into the parliament's hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

All the writers in the royal cause have represented this transaction of the Scots as highly injurious to the character of that nation, as if they had sold their king to his inveterate enemies, and bargained the life of their sovereign for money. That the delivery of this ill-fated prince to the two houses was a private stipulation between them and the English parliament, is scarce to be questioned: that it was criminal in the Scots, must in some measure be allowed; but the candour and impartiality which ought ever to be the guide of the historian, obliges me to observe, that what has chiefly rendered this measure odious, are the fatal consequences with which it was at last attended; and that it ought to be remembered, that these consequences were neither natural nor necessary, nor, indeed, at this time probable: neither the Scots, nor the majority of the English parliament themselves had the least intention of proceeding to the violent extremities which were afterwards pursued. It was, as a modern writer * very justly observes, the independents, determined enemies both to the king, the parliament, and the Scots, who twice seized the king by force, and at last brought him to a cruel and ignominious death, at the very time when the Scots and the presbyterians, which latter now composed the majority in parliament, were exerting their utmost endeavours, and even risking their lives and fortunes by rising in arms, in order to restore him to his throne.

Pitiable indeed was now the condition of the fallen Charles, and of his family. His queen was in France; his eldest son, after being a vagabond between Cornwall, Jersey, and Scilly, had been delivered into the hands of the same perfidious neighbours; his second and third sons (the dukes of York and Gloucester), with the princess Henrietta, his youngest daughter, were prisoners in London, subsisting on a scanty pension allowed them by their enemies: the princes Rupert and Maurice, after leaving Newark, wandered from place to place, ashamed of abandoning their uncle and generous benefactor, and retired to Oxford, where they had the benefit of the capitulation of that city, and retired beyond sea. He himself was immured by the detested rebels; denied all the comforts of this life, and even that which his soul most loved, the exercise of religion according to his own faith; for we are told, that not any of his chaplains were suffered to have access to him, nor so much as a Common Prayer Book allowed him for his own private use.

During the king's residence in the Scottish camp, died the earl of Essex, the discarded but still popular and powerful general of the parliament. His death at this critical juncture was a great loss to the public, and made it easier for Cromwell to carry on the destructive designs he had concerted; for doubtless, had Essex lived, he would have exerted all his influence and authority, to give a check to the fury that was going to prevail.

The parliament having now the person of the king in their possession, and all his armies and garrisons subdued by their forces, were rioting in the fulness of power: nor could the most frantic among them form a wish which they did not enjoy. But dissention, the never-failing attendant on anarchy and misrule, soon made its way among them, and blasted all their towering prospects.

Cromwell and his independents were now masters of the soldiery, who no longer looked upon themselves as servants to the parliament, but as its lawgivers. Fairfax, who had been the unhappy, and, as far as appears, the unwilling instrument of his country's misery, was not proof against the arts of Cromwell, who, on every occasion, molded him to his purpose. The parliament, though still all powerful in London, had, for some time, been apprehensive that the army was aiming at the supreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of these troublesome servants; an opportunity now seemed to offer, convenient for effecting their design: the troops in almost all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell especially backed their remonstrances with somewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be sent to Ireland; and the presbyterian faction in the house politically suffered them to live at free quarters, that the disbanding them, which was resolved upon, might be less unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears†.

carefully pointed out to Fairfax, the divisions and distractions both in church and state; he represented to him, that the army was now the only principle of unity, and the center to which all lines must point; that the soldiers were the chosen of God, and had with them that unerring light of grace which set at nought all sublunary institutions, and corrected all human errors: in a word, he engaged Fairfax to countenance a petition from the army against their being disbanded.

Matters stood thus between the parliament and army when the former, encouraged by the assurances they had from Cromwell, Jackson, Skippon, and other officers, of the fidelity of their respective troops, determined, by one bold stroke, to attempt to preserve their authority. Accordingly on the twenty-first of May, eleven regiments were voted to be disbanded, at different times and places, under the direction of Fairfax and Skippon; and that the others should be sent to Ireland. Instead of the obedience which the parliament flattered itself would have been paid to this decree, a council of officers met at St. Edmundsbury, to consider thereof; at the same time ten soldiers out of each regiment of horse and foot were chosen as agitators (or agents) for their respective regiments; and these all consulting together, it was unanimously resolved not to submit to this decree; and the council of the army appointed a general rendezvous for all the regiments, in order to provide for their common safety. The independent party began now to prevail more and more in parliament, and the presbyterians were so much intimidated, that many of them joined with the former in giving a commission to Cromwell to go to the head-quarters of the army, in order to quiet the dissatisfied soldiers; and a declaration was issued, that if the subscribers to the petition against disbanding the army, should proceed no farther in their opposition to that measure, now resolved upon by the house, they should be retained in the parliament's good graces; and that those who should continue their present disorderly conduct, should be proceeded against as enemies to the state.

In the mean time the council of agitators struck a blow of the last importance, and which must be allowed to be the most sensible measure that men in their circumstances could pursue. They thought they had as much right as the parliament to be jailors to the king, and that his person was the only pledge they could have for their safety, in their design of coming to an open rupture with their masters. This was suggested by the genius of Cromwell, who endeavoured to persuade the agitators (who were a body of men distinct from the council of war, and acted for the common soldiers), to take both the glory and the danger of the enterprise. Accordingly, on the fourth of June, a party of five hundred horse was detached in private to Holmby (where the king then resided), under the command of one Joyce, who, before the commencement of the war, had followed the trade of a taylor, but was now raised to the rank of a cornet, and was an active agitator in the army. Though it was late at night when they arrived, and the king was gone to bed, Joyce, having gained admission into the house, went with very little ceremony into the king's room, with a pistol in his hand, and told his majesty he must forthwith go with him to the army. It was in vain to resist: the king, after protracting the time as long as he could, stepped into his coach, and was immediately conveyed to the army, which was now on its march to the general rendezvous, at Triplo heath, near Cambridge. The parliament apprized of this event by their commissioners, who had the charge of the king at Holmby, were struck with fear and consternation. Fairfax himself was no less confounded at the king's arrival: that bold exploit performed, by Joyce, had never been imparted to the general; but Cromwell, by whose direction it had been done, and who was now arrived from London, cleared up all doubts and difficulties. The army being thus masters of the king's person, in a little time became masters of the parliament likewise, and managed all things just as they pleased, agreeable to what Cromwell is reported to have said to some of his intimate friends, "that now he had the king in his hands, he had the parliament in his pocket."

On the sixteenth of June the army drew up a charge of treason against eleven members of the house of commons, the chief of the presbyterian party, accusing them with betraying the cause of the parliament, endeavouring to break and destroy the army, &c. these were Denzil Holles, esq. sir Philip Stapleton, sir William Lewis, sir John Colworthy, sir William Waller, sir John Maynard, major general Massey, Mr. recorder Glyn, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. This round dealing of the army with the parliament, frightened the city of London so much, that, in great hurry, they sent a deputation of the aldermen and common-council to St. Alban's, into the neighbourhood of which the mutineers were now advanced, to disclaim any intention to raise forces or oppose the army. The parliament had settled the militia of London, according to the desire of the citizens, in the hands of the presbyterians, but being now over-awed by the army, they revoked their ordinance, and settled it as was before; upon this the common-council petitioned to have it settled their own way; and at the same time (July 26) a great multitude of the city apprentices, stirred up, no doubt, by the leading presbyterians in the city, came in a tumultuous manner to the parliament-house, and compelled them by threats and violence to do it, and also to vote that the king should come to London. The crafty Cromwell enjoyed this storm, which he saw would soon sweep before it the obstacles to his ambition: and indeed the transactions of the parliament at this time were so inconsistent, so tumultuous, and so contradictory, that they deserve no mention in history: to-day the independents mob, to-morrow that of the presbyterians prevailed. The parliament had no longer with it those able men who could direct the tumult, for the tumult now directed the parliament, which really had no will of its own. The commons, on the twenty-seventh of July adjourned to the thirtieth; and in the mean while not only Lenthall, speaker to the house of commons, but the earl of Manchester, who was speaker to the house of peers, with a great number of the members of both houses, fled with their regalia to the army, which, upon their arrival, and the news of the Westminster tumults, immediately directed its march towards London, in order, as they gave out, to restore the violated privileges of parliament.

Lenthall

Lenthall and Manchester were both presbyterians, and such a step in them was altogether unaccountable; but they probably thought that the army must in the end prevail, and they were willing to secure the interest of that party which was likely to have the ascendant.

The parliament, driven from their temporizing maxims, and obliged, either to abandon at once, or support by force, their power and liberty, prepared themselves for a vigorous defence, and resolved to oppose the violence of the army. On the thirtieth of July both houses met, and immediately elected new speakers, lord Hunsdon, and Henry Pelham; they repeated their former orders for levying troops: they constituted Massey commander: they ordered the trained-bands to guard the lines; and nothing was to be heard through the whole city but the sound of military preparations. It soon appeared, however, that all their resources were unequal to the present occasion. As the army advanced, Rainsborow, being sent over the river with a party of horse, presented himself before Southwark, and was readily admitted by some soldiers who were posted there for its defence, and who were determined not to divide their interests from those of the army. It was in vain to attempt resistance. The army marched through the city in triumph on the sixth of August; but observed the greatest order and regularity. They conducted to Westminster the two speakers, who took their seats without opposition. The eleven secluded members, being charged as the authors of the tumult, were expelled the house; and most of them abandoned the kingdom: seven peers were accused of high treason: the mayor, one sheriff, and three aldermen, committed to the Tower: several citizens and officers of the militia confined in other prisons: every decree of the parliament reversed from the time of the tumult till the return of the speakers: the lines about the city levelled: the independents re-established in the command of the militia: regiments stationed in Whitehall and the Meuse; and, in a word, the parliament reduced to a state of the most abject and deplorable slavery.

As to the king, he was obliged to attend the motions of the army since his late seizure, till, upon their approach to London, he was conducted to Hampton-court, where he was treated with great respect and civility by the heads of the army, and had all due honours paid him; though, in reality, he was no better than their prisoner. The parliament, or rather the army, who directed all their votes, put the command of the Tower into Fairfax's hands, declaring him at the same time generalissimo, with a power to put in or displace such officers as he pleased: but they were still at a loss how to dispose of the king's person. The independents had him in their power at Hampton-court. Cromwell and the presbyterian party both entered into treaty with him; the Scots likewise, by the earls of Lauderdale, Loudon, and Lanerk, their commissioners, proposed to carrying him off. Charles, who equally dreaded all those parties, was under a dreadful perturbation of spirit: at last perceiving that he had been the dupe of Cromwell, and being secretly apprized that the latter was forming dangerous designs against his life, resolved to withdraw himself from the army, and, accompanied only by sir John Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Legg, he privately left Hampton-court, in the night-time, on the thirteenth of November, and his escape was not discovered till near two hours after his departure, when those who entered his chamber found on the table some letters addressed to the general and the officers who had attended him.

The parliament was struck with the news of Charles's escape, and made it high-treason and death without mercy for any one to conceal him. But on the fifteenth they were eased of their fears by a letter from Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, acquainting them that the king was then at Cowes. This Hammond had espoused a daughter of the famous Hampden, and was entirely devoted to the interest of Cromwell; but as he was at the same time a nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, and was generally reputed a man of honour and integrity, it had been judged proper by Charles and the companions of his flight, to apply to him in the present necessity, when no other expedient could be devised. Accordingly Charles went over to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under Hammond's protection, hoping there to find an asylum, instead of which he only met with a new prison.

Some historians have imagined that the king's retreat to the Isle of Wight was entirely voluntary; others think his going thither was the effect of Cromwell's artifice, who tried to urge him to this measure by groundless alarms, purposely conveyed to him, as if the agitators had sworn to take his life. Be this as it will, certain it is Charles was never guilty of a weaker step, nor one more agreeable to Cromwell and his enemies. He was now, by orders of the parliament, confined in Carisbrook castle, with orders that none of his friends or adherents should be admitted to his presence, or to remain on the island. He was now in a place removed from his friends, at the disposal of the army, whence it would be almost impossible to deliver him, either by force or stratagem. Charles, however, in this melancholy situation, was not without an appearance of a resource: he held a secret correspondence with the lord Inchiquin, who commanded for the parliament in Ireland; he had private assurance of a strong support from abroad; he was even at this time, by his agents, tampering with the chief officers of the navy; he was carrying on intrigues with the presbyterians in the city; by Cromwell's connivance he held intelligence with officers about his (Cromwell's) own person; and he had now concluded a treaty with the Scots, in all respects disadvantageous and dishonourable; and therefore, by the vicious logic of the Scottish commissioners, who persuaded him to sign it, not to be observed farther than as it served the present turn. By this treaty he approved of their solemn league and covenant, and confirmed all they had done against episcopacy in Scotland; and made some other concessions, which in his soul he abhorred; in consideration of which the Scots engaged themselves to pour a new army into England, and the king was to protect all his subjects of his three kingdoms who should join him.

During the anarchy which now prevailed, the fatal consequence of a divided capital, an insolent army, and the flight and imprisonment of their lawful sovereign, the same spirit which had so long animated the independents, on a sudden took possession of several of the common soldiers of the army, who formed themselves into a body under the name of Levellers, an appellation which signified their design of reducing every thing to an equality, and acknowledging no superior in church, army, or state. They did no more indeed than what the commons had done before them; they copied the examples of their officers, and their pretensions seem to be full as well founded as those of the others. Their numbers were considerable: Cromwell, finding that they were likely to become very dangerous, as they acted upon his own principles, and that, if they were suffered to go on, they might deprive him of the fruit of all his policy and labour, formed the sudden resolution to quell them at the hazard of his own life. He repaired to a meeting of those levellers, with a guard of chosen men, with whom he had always been victorious, and began to expostulate with the mutineers, in a canting speech, about the reason of their violent proceedings. Receiving an insolent answer from one of the most licentious, he knocked down two or three of them with his own hand, and falling on the rest with incredible fury, he dispersed the whole body, caused some of them to be hanged by sentence of a court-martial, and sent a considerable number prisoners to London. By acting with the same vigour and intrepidity on several other occasions, he subdued the mutinous spirit of this dangerous sect, and reduced the army to submission.

While these things were in agitation, Charles, in order if possible, to satisfy the wishes of his people, had promised, by a message sent from Carisbroke castle, to relinquish, during his own life, the power of the militia, and the appointment of all the officers of state; on condition that, after his death, these prerogatives should be restored to the crown: but the parliament, directed by the independents and the army, instead of agreeing to these terms, drew up four propositions, which they sent him as preliminaries, and to which they demanded his positive assent before they would engage in any treaty.

By the first of these he was desired to bestow upon the parliament the military power for twenty years, together with an authority to raise whatever money should be found necessary for supporting the forces; and, even after the expiration of the twenty years, they reserved a right of resuming the same authority, whenever the safety of the kingdom should seem to require it. By the second, he must revoke all the proclamations and declarations which he had issued against the parliament, and acknowledge that assembly to have taken arms for their own just and necessary defence. By the third, he was to repeal all the acts, and cancel all the patents of peerage, which had passed the great seal, from the time of its being carried to Oxford by the lord-keeper Littleton. By the fourth, he must grant the two houses power to adjourn as they pleased: a demand, in appearance of no great moment; but calculated by the independents with a view of removing the parliament to places where it would be wholly under the direction of the army. The king thought it hard, that he should be obliged to make such concessions, while nothing was stipulated in his favour; and to depend entirely on the generosity of his enemies, for what he should afterwards obtain. He requested, therefore a personal treaty with the parliament, and begged that the terms, on both sides, should be previously settled, before any concessions were demanded.

The refusal of Charles so exasperated the independent party, that many bitter speeches were made against him in the house of commons, particularly by Cromwell and his son-in-law Ireton, the former of whom seemed now to have resolved upon the taking the life of Charles. He durst not, however, impart the depth of his design to any but Ireton, and one or two bosom favourites; but though he concealed it from Fairfax, yet he soon preached and prayed him and the other officers into a spirit that was fit for his purposes. Having thus fixed the army, he knew he should have no difficulty with the parliament, where, upon the king's rejecting the propositions, sir Thomas Wroth had the boldness to move, not only that he should be removed close prisoner to some inland castle, but that articles of impeachment should be drawn up against him, himself deprived of the government, and a new form of government established. This motion was seconded by Ireton and Cromwell, with great warmth, but in general terms; for they only recommended it to the house to settle the kingdom without the king, who had rejected all these propositions, promising the army in such a case would stand by the parliament: "but (says Cromwell, with a stern look, clapping his hand to his sword) teach not the army, through despair to seek their safety by some other means than adhering to you who will not stick to yourselves; and how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge."

In fine, the house, over-awed by his menaces, resolved, on the third of January, 1648, "that no more addresses should be made to the king, nor messages received from him: and to this the lords some days after agreed; the army now promising, in an address to both houses, to stand by the parliament against the king, on whom Hammond was ordered to have a stricter guard than ever, upon an information that a fleet of Dutch ships had anchored near the Isle of Wight, with a design to rescue him.

The king being reduced to this melancholy condition, by the insolence of the army, began to be deeply pitied by the more moderate part of his subjects, many of whom began to stir for him in several parts of the kingdom, in which they were joined by the presbyterians, from their hatred to the independents. Even the parliament, who were still mostly presbyterians, though they had lost their leaders, had not gone such lengths against the king, if they had not been over-awed by the army. What much encouraged the insurrections in England, was a prospect of a powerful assistance from Scotland; for the Scottish commissioners having entered a strong protestation against forcing upon the king the four propositions already mentioned, and their protest being disregarded, provoked at this and many other indignities to which they were exposed, and touched with compassion for the misfortunes and sufferings of their sovereign, had undertaken to arm Scotland in his favour. In this they succeeded so well that they procured a vote of the Scottish parliament to raise forty thousand men for the rescue of the king's person, and to give the command thereof to the duke of Hamilton, contrary to the sentiments of the kirk commissioners and the zealous covenanters under the marquis of Argyll; who were apprehensive; that if this scheme should succeed, it would effect the restoration of monarchy without the establishment of presbytery.

While the Scots were preparing for the invasion of England, every part of that kingdom was filled with tumults, insurrections, conspiracies, and discontents. The presbyterians, who, by their credit and interest, had chiefly supported the war, were provoked to find themselves over-reached and over-powered by the fraud and chicanery of the independents. The royalists, incensed at the cruel treatment which the king suffered from the army, were strongly prompted to restore him to liberty, and to regain the advantages, which they had formerly lost. All orders of men were fired with indignation at seeing the civil subjected to the military power, and the king and parliament at once enslaved by a mercenary army. But though the whole nation seemed to unite in their hatred of military usurpation, the views entertained by the several parties were so different, that little concert was observed in these insurrections.

Langhorne, Poyer, and Powel, presbyterian officers, who headed bodies of troops in Wales, were the first who declared themselves, and, early in the beginning of the year 1648, assembled a considerable army in those countries, which were warmly attached to the royal cause: young Hales and Goring, who had been made earl of Norwich, excited commotions in Kent: an insurrection was raised in Essex by lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, and sir George Lisle: the earl of Holland, who, since the beginning of the civil wars, had frequently shifted sides, endeavoured to collect forces in Surry: Morrice had surprized the castle of Pomfret, in Yorkshire.

What seemed of the greatest importance, was the general spirit of discontent that had seized the navy. No less than seventeen ships, lying in the mouth of the river, declared against the army; and setting Rainsborow, their admiral, on shore, sailed over to Holland, and put themselves under the command of the prince of Wales. About the same time the king's second son, the duke of York (afterwards king James II.) who was then about fifteen years old, and was a kind of a state prisoner in St James's palace, escaped more fortunately from his confinement than his father had done from Hampton-court, and retired to Holland, where he joined his brother the prince of Wales. All these events however seemed only as the means to hasten the ruin of the unhappy king.

The genius of Cromwell, or the anger of Heaven upon a nation so bespotted with crimes of the foulest dyes as England now was, prevailed over every human precaution. Cromwell marched in person into Wales; and, after taking Pembroke castle, which stood a siege of four weeks, he put an end to the commotions in that part of the country: Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell, who surrendered prisoners at discretion, were tried by a court-martial, and condemned to draw lots for their lives; the lot falling on Poyer, he was accordingly shot to death. General Fairfax (now a lord by the death of his father) successfully opposed the royal party in Kent, under the earl of Norwich: he defeated him at Maidstone, and drove him with his men into Essex, where those who had taken arms under lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, and sir George Lisle, were forced to shut themselves up in Colchester, where they endured a long siege, and at last were compelled to surrender. Lucas and Lisle were shot to death; Goring (earl of Norwich) and Capel were sent prisoners to Windsor castle. In the course of this summer the earl of Holland, Villiers duke of Buckingham, and his brother Francis, were defeated at Kingston upon Thames, by colonel Livesey: the earl was taken prisoner, the duke fled into France, and the lord Francis was slain.

Cromwell now saw his bloody policy of governing by the sword, succeed beyond expectation: it was not now as formerly, when he had the unarmed authority of parliament, and the timorous citizens of London to deal with, for the nation now on every side was in a blaze, which could be quenched only with streams of blood. Besides Kent, Essex, Wales, and the northern counties, the Cornishmen were up in arms, but were defeated at Penzance by sir Hardresse Waller, who afterwards took possession of Exeter. In like manner the inhabitants of Rutlandshire, Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, and the neighbouring counties, took arms, and were assembled near Stamford. Sir John Owen had renewed the war in Wales, and besieged Caernarvon castle; but was defeated and taken prisoner by colonel Carter. From these circumstances the reader may conclude how expert six or seven years daily experience had made the parliament's army in the trade of murder, since about thirty thousand of their troops could keep upwards of a million in subjection, for the army was now actually at war with all the people of England. Its most determined enemies were those who had been most active against Charles in the beginning and progress of the war, and were therefore considered by the army as apostates, and they were on all occasions hated with greater severity than the royalists themselves.

The invasion from Scotland ended no less fatally than the other attempts made this year in behalf of the royal cause. The Scottish army, under duke Hamilton, amounting to near twenty thousand men, entered England on the thirteenth of July, and were joined by five thousand English, under sir Marmaduke Langdale; and falling upon the parliament's army, under major-general Lambert, near Appleby, in Westmoreland, they forced him to retire into the town, from whence he retreated to Kirby Steven, and afterwards to Bowes leaving some of his forces behind to defend the castle, which was besieged, and taken on the seventh of August, by sir Philip Musgrave. The Scots staid some time at Kendal, and major-general Lambert's army increased daily with additional forces: at length Cromwell, having quietted the commotions in Wales, marched with his forces to join him, and in his way took the town of Pomfret, but the castle still held out for the king, but was reduced by Lambert before the end of the year. Hamilton leaving Kendal, directed his march into Lancashire, with an intent to advance to London: this Cromwell was resolved to prevent at all hazards, and therefore marched to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their forces. Here Cromwell ventured to attack them with a body not amounting to half their number; and though the royalists behaved with uncommon bravery, yet, not being properly supported by their confederates, were on the seventeenth of August; entirely routed, and most of them put to the sword. Hamilton and his troops were also shamefully defeated, and chased to Uttoxeter, where the duke himself was taken prisoner by the lord Grey of Groby, and sent in safe custody to Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire: sir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an inn.

During these transactions in England, the prince of Wales, having sent his brother, the duke of York, to the Hague, went on board the fleet at Helvoetsluys, and set sail for England, in order to join and head the Scottish army when it should enter that kingdom. When he arrived at Yarmouth, the inhabitants refused him admittance; then he directed his course to the river Thames, and took several rich vessels belonging to the Londoners, which were afterwards restored. Mean while the earl of Warwick assembled a squadron, with which he sailed in quest of the prince, and anchored his ship so near him in the river, that an engagement was thought unavoidable. The prince of Wales was eager for battle, and accordingly weighed in order to attack the earl; but the wind failing, and afterwards blowing full in his teeth, he could not execute his resolution: Warwick being reinforced with some fresh ships, and the royal fleet being in want of provisions, young Charles was persuaded to return to Helvoetsluys, whether he was followed by the enemy.

Cromwell improving the success he had obtained over the Scottish army, marched directly to Edinburgh; by which vigorous step he broke the measures of the royalists so much, that Berwick and Carlisle, which Hamilton had taken, were restored to the English parliament: and leaving Lambert in Scotland with some troops, he returned with his army to England, where his presence was now much wanted by his party, who by this time had firmly resolved the death of their sovereign.

For at the beginning of these troubles the presbyterian party in the house, in the city, and other places of the kingdom, began to resume their courage. Several petitions were presented for a personal treaty with the king; and when the army was removed from London into different parts of the kingdom to quell the risings of the people, the secluded members, and others who had absented themselves, having returned to their seats, the votes of no more addresses were repealed, and it was resolved by both houses "to enter into a personal treaty with the king; and Newport, in the Isle of Wight, should be the place of treaty; and that his majesty should be there with, honour, freedom, and safety; and five lords and ten commoners were appointed commissioners for managing the negotiation, which was allowed to last for forty days from the day of its commencement*." This last was an artful provision thrown in by the independents in the house, who wanted to spin out matters till the re-approach of the army to the neighbourhood of London, when they knew they could carry every thing they wished. Accordingly, sir Henry Vane, junior, who was one of the commissioners for the commons, so delayed the treaty by starting new difficulties, that it was not began till the fifteenth of September, a month after Cromwell had defeated the Scots, and the army was every where victorious. By the same means the treaty itself was prolonged till Cromwell was returned out of Scotland, and at hand to support Fairfax and the rest of the army, which being now collected together, after its various successes, had its headquarters at Windsor, and none remained to stem the torrent of its bloody rage, but the helpless king and parliament. At Cromwell's instigation the general officers agreed upon that execrable remonstrance, which in effect took off the head of Charles. On the twentieth of November, after some debates had passed between the two houses concerning the persons to be excepted from pardon, colonel Ewers, at the head of seven other officers, presented to the commons this remonstrance. It began with a demand to drop the treaty with the king, and to bring him to justice; to declare the prince of Wales and the duke of York to be incapable of government; that the army be satisfied out of the estates of delinquents; that justice be done to the capital causes of war; that a period be put to that parliament; that the frequent returns of annual or triennial parliaments be secured; that there be a more equal representative of the people in the house of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king should be disabled from electing or being elected; that the supreme power of government should be invested in the representatives of the people, among whom there should be liberty of entering dissents; that all future kings should be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general settlement should be established by the general contract of the people; but that none should have a share in it, who should oppose the matters contained in that remonstrance.

The parliament, though on all hands surrounded with the most imminent danger, and though unable to resist the usurpations of the army, nobly determined to oppose them to the last; and rather involve the nation in anarchy and confusion, than give their authority to those violent and desperate measures which were now projected. They deigned not to return any answer to the remonstrance of the army; but the latter had concerted measures to put it out of the power of the parliament to obstruct their designs: for colonel Hammond received an order, on the twenty-second of November, from Fairfax to attend him, and to resign to colonel Ewers (the same who had presented the army's remonstrance) the custody of the king's person, which was accordingly done, and the helpless king was, on the thirtieth of the same month, carried over to Hurst castle†, where he was again shut up from all his attendants, and continued close prisoner. The presbyterians exerted themselves anew on this occasion against the army, which they perceived to be upon the point of giving law to the parliament. On the fourth of December they voted "that the removal of the king out of the Isle of Wight was without the knowledge and consent of the house." Next day it was voted by a majority of one hundred and twenty-nine against eighty-three, "that the answers of the king to the propositions of both houses (during the treaty at Newport) are a ground for the house to proceed upon, for the settlement of the kingdom."

This vote brought matters to a crisis between the parliament and the army; the officers, conscious of their own strength, resolved no longer to keep measures: employing the name of Fairfax (for he still suffered them to make use of his name) they conducted the army to London on the sixth of December, and posted guards in Whitehall, the Meuse, St. James's, Durham-house, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard. Next day colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, had surrounded the house with two regiments, by whom above forty members, as they were coming to the parliament, were seized, and committed to the custody of the guards in several inns in Westminster and the parts adjoining: and, not satisfied with this, they presented a paper to the house, wherein they accused major-general Brown and ninety members, for inviting the Scots into England the last summer, and therefore required they might be excluded the house. Even this violent outrage was not sufficient to subdue the parliament: they adjourned for four or five days, in which space the army was busied in completing their form of government.

And now the fall of the unhappy king came on apace. Cornwall, who was then returned to his seat in the house of commons, and had been thanked for his services in Scotland, had now no other difficulty in completing the murder of Charles, but to disguise the horror of the deed from Fairfax, who began to fear he had gone too far, nor could all the arts of Cromwell restore him to perfect quiet. The remnant of the house of commons, consisted of a set of men raised from the lowest class of life, the slaves of the army, whose officers exercised unlimited power in all proceedings: the city itself was in subjection to them. Cromwell, who could do what he pleased with the soldiers, got them to present petitions against the king; and the counties of Somerset and Norfolk, with the fleet under the earl of Warwick, sent a declaration in which they joined with the army: the common-council of London, which had so lately declared for the king, now wholly under the direction of the victorious party, concurred in the petition to have him brought to trial. At length this bold refusal of the house of commons presumed to form a resolution which far transcended all former acts of treason and fanaticism: on the twenty-third of December they appointed a committee to draw up a formal accusation or impeachment of his majesty. Colonel Harrison, the son of a butcher, was commanded to conduct the royal victim from Hurst castle to Windsor. On the twenty-eighth of December, the committee having made its report, an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the house of commons by Scot, an independent minister. This was founded on a vote which made it "high treason in a king of England, for the time being, to levy war against the parliament and kingdom of England." This ordinance, with many detestable particulars, was very quickly carried through the commons, and on the second of January, 1649, it was carried up to the house of peers by the lord Grey of Groby.

The house of peers, during the whole course of the civil wars, had possessed little authority or influence; but since the king's fall, it had been wholly insignificant; and most of the members, disgusted at the public proceedings, declined to give their attendance. It happened, however, that day, to be more full than usual, and they were convened to the number of sixteen. Without the least doubt or hesitation, they unanimously rejected the vote of the lower-house, and adjourned themselves for ten days; hoping by this means, to restrain the furious career of the commons.

But the commons were not to be diverted from their purpose by so small an obstacle: they voted to proceed in trying the king, and in all other matters, without the concurrence of the lords; and on the fourth of January they passed the following votes, which will best speak for themselves as to the purpose they were to serve:

"Resolved, &c. That the commons of England in parliament assembled, do declare that the people are, under God, the original of all just power.

"And also declare that the commons of England in parliament assembled, being chosen by, and representing, the people, have the supreme power in this nation.

"And do also declare, that whatever is enacted, or declared for them, by the commons in parliament assembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the consent and concurrence of the king, or house of peers, be not had thereunto."

They also voted, "That all members and others, appointed to act in any ordinance with peers, were empowered and enjoined to sit, act, and execute, notwithstanding the peers joined not therein." And so earnest were both the commons and the army about the king's trial, that the queen, desiring to see her husband before his arraignment, could not obtain a pass for her secure coming and returning.

On the sixth of January, the ordinance for the king's trial was turned into an act of the commons alone, and engrossed: and proclamation was made two days after, in Westminster hall, Cheapside, and the Old Exchange, for witnesses to come in against him; and commissioners were appointed for trying him. At first it was proposed to name some of the house of peers to be commissioners for that purpose; but, upon second thoughts, that intention was laid aside, and Thomas lord Fairfax, general, Oliver Cromwell, esq. lieutenant-general, Henry Ireton, esq. commissary-general, major-general Philip Skippon, sir Hardress Waller, knight, and other persons, to the number of one hundred and forty-five, were appointed commissioners and judges on this surprizing trial.

When those commissioners met, they chose serjeant Bradshaw for their president. He was a bold insolent lawyer, and voted into the presidency, not for his abilities, of which he is said not to have been destitute in his profession, but because he was void of all tenderness towards names, persons, or offices, and was dauntless enough to go coolly through the impious work. Dr. Dorislaus, Steele, Ashe, and Cooke, were appointed assistants to the court, for drawing up and managing the evidence: the former of those was a civilian; the other three were common lawyers, and Steele appears to have been a man of parts. The court in which they were to act was christened by the name of the High Court of Justice, and provided with proper officers and decorations, to give it an august appearance. Bradshaw was attended by a guard, had a sword of state, and a mace, embossed with the king's own arms, carried before him; and he behaved with that gravity which became a supreme magistrate.

On the nineteenth of January the king was brought from Windsor to St. James's house, and all things were prepared for his fatal tragedy, in which the commons proceeded with unabated earnestness, notwithstanding the house of lords, and the remonstrance of the parliament of Scotland, now convened, against it.

On Saturday, January 20, 1649, the king was brought before the high court of justice, in Westminster hall, having been guarded thither by colonel Hacker and about thirty officers armed. I shall not detain the reader with the particulars of this execrable trial, which are to be found in every history of those times; they are neither interesting nor instructive: it is sufficient to say that Charles's deportment before his infamous judges was very majestic; he looked undauntedly on the array of troops that attended him, and the pageantry of the court; and, without moving his hat, or shewing the regicides the smallest mark of reverence, he seated himself in a chair of crimson velvet, prepared for him within the bar. It may be thought strange by some readers, that as a great number, if not the majority, of the commissioners who were impowered to act on this occasion, detested the guilt of the court, they did not attend and endeavour to prevent the sentence*: but the truth is, the furiousness of the army was such, that had any difficulty occurred in condemning Charles, it would have purged the court as it had done the parliament.

The substance of the charge against the king was, "that he had endeavoured to set up a tyrannical power, and to that end had raised and maintained a cruel war against the parliament." The king, on the hearing this charge read by the clerk of the court, made no other answer but by denying the authority of the court; the same he did on the twenty-second and twenty-third. At length being brought before them a fourth time, on January 27, he earnestly desired before sentence, to be heard before the lords and commons (intending, as it was thought, to have resigned his crown to his eldest son Charles, prince of Wales), but his request was not granted; and so still persisting in disowning the jurisdiction of the court, and consequently in his refusal to answer the charge, his silence was taken for confession; sentence of death was passed upon him, after an insolent speech made by Bradshaw, all the members present standing up by way of approbation: their names were as follows; Bradshaw, president, Lisle, Say, Cromwell, Ireton, Hardress Waller, Bourchier, Heveningham, Pennington, Martin, Purefoy, Barkstead, Tomlinson, Blackiston, Millington, Constable, Ludlow, Hutchinson, Livesey, Tichburn, Roe, Lilburne, Smith, Edwards, Clement, Wogan, Norton, Harvey, Venn, Scot, Andrews, Fleetwood, Mayne, J. Temple, Scrope, Dean, Okey, Hewson, Goffe, Holland, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Allen, Pelham, Blagrove, Walton, Harrison, Whalley, Pride, Ewers, Grey of Groby, Danvers, Maleverer, More, Alured, Cawley, Stapley, Downs, Horton, Hammond, Love, Potter, Garland, Dixwell, P. Temple, Waite. The sentence ran: "That he, Charles Stuart, king of England, having been convicted and attainted as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy, should be put to death, by severing his head from his body." This sentence, and the warrant for execution, in consequence thereof, were signed and sealed by all the commissioners above mentioned, except such of them whose names are printed in Italic characters. And here it will be necessary to take notice, that colonel Richard Ingoldsby's hand and seal were, against his consent, put to the death-warrant, by Oliver Cromwell; but his early disclaiming the fact, and his active and successful endeavours for the restoration of king Charles II. to his crown and kingdoms, not only obtained his pardon, but also gained him the king's favour, who conferred on him the dignity of a knight of the Bath at his coronation.

* It was a remark, that in calling over the court the first day of the king's trial, when the crier pronounced the name of lord Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice came from the gallery, crying, "He has more wit than to be here." When the impeachment was read, "in the name of the good people of England; That is a lye," said the same voice, in a shriller tone, "Not a half, nor a quarter: where are the people or their representatives? Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traitor."

Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, gave orders to fire at the place from whence these insolent speeches proceeded, calling out, "Down with the whores; shoot them:" but it was soon found, that the lady Fairfax was there, and that it was she who had the courage to utter them. She was a person of very noble birth, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury; but, being misled by the prejudices of the times, she had long encouraged her husband's zeal against the royal cause, and was now, as well as he, filled with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected consequences of all his victories and successes. was not a higher block: then addressing himself to the colonels Tomlinson, Hacker, and some other persons who were on the scaffold, he declared himself innocent of having commenced war against the parliament: he owned that his fate was a just judgment from Heaven, for having consented to those he trusted had over him, increased the distempers of his reign; and his losing entirely the confidence of his people, with the clashing interest of parties, violent and furious in their opposition to each other, at last completed his ruin, after

place was invested by Essex. His approaches were so indifferently carried on, that the parliament's engineers appeared to be very little acquainted with the business of besieging towns. They had, however, such advantages by the situation of the place, that their cannon played directly into the town, and one of their shot disabled Aston, to the irreparable loss of the king, who was now preparing to relieve the place; but while he was upon his march, the garrison, under Fielding, who had succeeded Aston in command, after killing, in their sallies, a great number of parliamentarians, found themselves obliged to capitulate, and to deliver up the town; for which, Fielding was afterwards sentenced to lose his head by a council of war at Oxford, but he was pardoned by Charles. The articles of capitulation were extremely advantageous for Charles, by giving him back his whole garrison; but they were very ill observed by the parliamentarians, which occasioned severe reprisals afterwards by the royal party.

At this time scarce one county in England was free from the horror of civil war; the royalists were victorious in most parts; in Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Staffordshire, many encounters passed between the king's forces under prince Rupert, and the earl of Northampton, the lord Brooke, Sir John Gill, and Sir William Brereton, for the parliament; in one of which, fought on Hopton heath, the earl of Northampton lost his life, and the lord Brooke was slain before the town of Litchfield, which was afterwards taken by his forces, and again retaken by prince Rupert. In Yorkshire, and the more northern parts, the lord Fairfax and his son, Sir Thomas, afterwards so famous under the title of General Fairfax, had success greater than could be expected from the small force they had with them; but at length the whole county was reduced by the king's troops, and Fairfax, with his followers, were obliged to shut themselves up in Hull. The greatest part of Wales remained firm to the royal cause; the parliament, therefore, in order to check the king's good fortune in that part of the country, dispatched the earl of Stamford with an army into the West, where Sir Ralph Hopton, with his forces, lay before Plymouth, in the parliament's possession. Sir Ralph, hearing of the earl's approach, drew forth his troops and gave him battle, in which he defeated the greatest part of his forces; and then a truce was agreed upon between the earl and him for three weeks; during which time Sir George Chudleigh, who had been very active and successful for the parliament in Denbighshire, upon a due reflection on the views of both parties in the present unnatural contest, quitted the opposition, and joined himself to the king; but, to satisfy his friends of the reasons of this tergiversation, he published a short declaration, which we are persuaded our readers will be pleased to see, not only as it is doing great honour to the understanding, integrity, and patriotic loyalty of this gallant officer, but as it speaks the sentiments of most of the moderate part of the opposition, in regard to the state of affairs between the king and parliament at this juncture.

"That petitions of right, says he, are commendable, and remonstrances may be useful; but arms, though defensive, are very doubtful. My lot (says he) fell to cast on the parliament side, by a strong opinion of the goodness of their cause, which, to my judgment, then appeared to be so. Religion, and the subjects liberty, seemed to me to be in danger; but the destruction of kingdoms cannot be the way to save it, nor can the loss of Christian subjects, nor the subjects loss of their estates by plunder or assessment, concur with piety, nor yet with propriety: as for religion, which is the chief, his majesty (whom God long preserve) has given us unquestionable security. I have cast myself at my sovereign's feet, and implored his gracious pardon; I will contend no more in word or deed. And this my resolution, with the indisputable grounds thereof, I thought good to declare to my friends and countrymen, that they may understand that my change doth proceed from no compulsion."

The parliamentarians, however, were not discouraged; they knew they had powerful resources, and though for the present unsuccessful, they still acted as masters against whom the king had rebelled. They condemned and executed for treason several of their fellow-subjects, who had delivered up to the king his own towns*; while the king, on his side, refrained from all cruel reprisals on his prisoners. This conduct may serve to justify, in the opinion of posterity, a prince who has been represented so criminal towards his people, and teach us to pity the unnatural persecution he suffered from his subjects, while we blame the causes of offence he had given them; for which, however, he had offered every atonement, every reparation, that majesty could make.

The two capital armies, that under Charles, and that under Essex, lay all this while inactive; the former about Abingdon and Oxford, the latter about Reading. Essex, in the whole of his operations against the king, seems to have been under the constant check of rencountering loyalty. According to the account given of the battle of Edge hill by the earl of Clarendon himself, he could have taken the king and the two princes prisoners, but forbore, most probably from the motives already assigned; in fine, a strong probability arises, that he was not yet in earnest in the opposition, and that he never intended to carry hostilities farther against the king and his party than was necessary for his own defence in the service he had embraced. However this might be, his conduct appeared very doubtful to his best friends, and the violent party in parliament could not help distrusting him; they now openly blamed him for not marching against Oxford; and, as the parliament officers who served under him were daily improving in military knowledge, he could find no pretext for longer inactivity, being lately joined by Sir William Waller, who had by this

* Yeamans and Bourcher were executed at Bristol, for endeavouring to seize that town for the king; the like happened to several gentlemen and citizens of London, for a design laid to seize the city and several members of parliament, in order to have put a period to the civil war, by stopping the issues of it in the fountain. Edmund Waller, the famous poet, was on

time reduced Hereford, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Worcester; he made a march towards Oxford, and fixed his head quarters at Thame, upon the borders of Buckinghamshire, in order to over-awe that county, which now grew turbulent in favour of Charles.

While he remained in this post, colonel Urrey, a Scotch officer, who had served in Germany with general Ruthven, now created earl of Brentford, took this opportunity of deserting to the king, and persuaded prince Rupert to beat up the quarters of the enemy, after having particularly informed him of their disposition. To demonstrate the practicability of such an exploit, he proposed to go as a volunteer with a detachment, which he conducted to part of these quarters, where he defeated some regiments and brought a great number of prisoners to Oxford. Prince Rupert, encouraged by his success, complied with his advice in making a more vigorous attack upon that part of their army, which was quartered at Thame. They departed from Oxford with a strong body of horse, and taking a long circuit in the night, arrived, by break of day, at Wickham, where they cut in pieces two regiments of the enemy; they attacked another quarter with the same success, and attempted to retire by a bridge, at which they had left a sufficient guard. By this time the earl of Essex had taken the alarm and detached part of his cavalry to detain the prince till he should be able to advance with the infantry. They overtook him at the skirts of Chalgrave-field, where he wheeled about, and charged them with such impetuosity, that they betook themselves to flight, after having lost some of their best officers, and among the rest the celebrated John Hampden, who had acted as colonel of a regiment, since the beginning of the war, and proved in many encounters that his courage was equal to any other of his extraordinary endowments. The candour and moderation for which this gentleman was distinguished in the beginning of the opposition to the king's measures, had given way to a violent animosity against the ancient constitution, and the person of his sovereign, by whom he had been declared guilty of high-treason. This was an affront he never could forgive. He became passionate, and even ferocious; discouraged all overtures towards an accommodation, and now his death struck a damp into the hearts of the whole faction. Other officers were slain or taken prisoners. The army under Essex was dispirited by these checks, diminished by distempers and want of necessaries, so that he thought proper to remove from Thame and put his troops into quarters of refreshment at St. Alban's, Uxbridge, and other places in that neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Rupert returned in triumph to Oxford, and recommended Urrey to the king in such warm encomiums of his courage and conduct, that he received the honour of knighthood, and was preferred to the command of a regiment.

The king's affairs still wore a favourable aspect in the western counties, where the neutrality was over-ruled as in the North by the votes and declarations of the parliament. Major Chudleigh, with a body of the enemy, made an attempt upon Launceston, but being repulsed, retired to Kingston. About the middle of May, the earl of Stamford marching into Cornwall, at the head of seven thousand horse and foot, with a train of artillery, encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton, and detached sir George Chudleigh, with twelve hundred cavalry, to surprize the sheriff of the county at Bodmin. The Cornish loyalists, under lord Mohun and sir Ralph Hopton, seized this opportunity of attacking their infantry in the absence of their horse: they formed their small army into four divisions, and attacked the hill in as many different parts; after a very warm contest, they met upon the summit, disarmed major-general Chudleigh, routed the parliamentarians, and took possession of their cannon and camp, while the earl of Stamford retired with precipitation to Exeter, and sir George Chudleigh, with their cavalry, took the same route from Bodmin, as soon as he was informed of the earl's disaster. The victorious loyalists, having received orders to join prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford, who had advanced as far as Somersetshire, began their march, and joining the marquis at Chard, the two bodies united, amounted to above seven thousand men, in excellent order, with a good train of artillery: thus strengthened, they took Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunster castle, almost without opposition.

The reputation which the Cornish men obtained in this action, gave infinite spirits to the king's party; and the affair of the West became now the principal object both with Charles and the parliament; the latter put Sir William Waller at the head of a new army, to march into Somersetshire and retrieve their affairs. Waller was a man of spirit and fortune, and had served the parliament so effectually on many occasions, that, in the city of London, he obtained the name of William the Conqueror; he was a thorough paced republican, and was considered by the violent of the parliament party as the most proper officer to succeed Essex, if it should be found necessary to lay that general aside: in this expedition, however, he proved very unfortunate, for, in less than a fortnight, he lost two battles, one at Lansdown, on the fifth of July, wherein Sir Bevil Grenville was slain; and another at Roundway-down, on July the tenth; in the latter of which, his army was entirely routed, and so dispersed, that it was no longer serviceable; Waller himself fled to Bristol.

The affairs of the king in the North at this time went on very prosperously; the queen had again returned to England with a second supply of men, and a sum of money she had raised by pawning the crown-jewels in Holland; for which the parliament, agreeable to the usual spirit of their proceedings, had voted her guilty of high-treason. Matters, however, were so successful for Charles, that the queen ventured to obey him, by marching south, with all the troops, artillery, and ammunition, under her command, and found her royal consort at Edge-hill, on the very day his troops gained the battle of Roundway-down: from Edge-hill they entered Oxford in a triumphant manner, while the Cornish forces reduced Bath, and then marched to form the siege of Bristol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. It was the twenty-fourth day of July, before the approaches began; the place was rich, and garrisoned by two thousand five hundred foot, and a regiment of horse, under the command of Fiennes, who was but an indifferent soldier. After some deliberation, the city was assaulted by the loyalists with such incredible courage, that the garrison beat a parley, and surrendered upon terms. Besides this important success, Charles, at this time, gained another, by prince Rupert's seizing the ships in which the most wealthy citizens of Bristol had embarked their riches, with a view of conveying them to London.

All this time Charles had subsisted his forces by contributions and assessments, or by loans, and voluntary presents from all parts of the kingdom; but the supplies, even including those brought him by his queen, were still very disproportionate to his pressing necessities. The resources of the parliament were more numerous, and more considerable: and, of consequence, all their military preparations were in much greater order and readiness. Besides a tax levied in London, amounting to the twenty-fifth part of every one's substance, they imposed on that city a weekly assessment of ten thousand pounds, and another of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen, on the rest of the kingdom: and as their authority was very great in most counties, they levied these taxes with the utmost regularity.

A few days after the taking of Bristol, Charles went to view that city, in which he had not long arrived before he received news of the surrender of Dorchester to the earl of Caernarvon; and a day or two after, Portland, Weymouth, and Melcombe, submitted likewise; so that by the end of this summer, the royal party was in possession of all the western counties from the farthest part of Cornwall, except some few garrisons that were blocked up. In the North, even to the borders of Scotland, there was no army in the field to oppose the king, and his forces marched whithersoever they pleased. London was now greatly divided between the two parties; many of the wealthier and more creditable citizens favoured the king's cause; and most of the gentry of the associated counties already mentioned, were ready, upon the first appearance of the king at the head of his army, to have secured those counties for him. These considerations seemed naturally to point out, as the only rational step, that the king should have marched with his army to London, and have dispatched the earl of Newcastle, at the head of his victorious band, into the associated counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, whereby a speedy end would, in all probability, have been put to this civil war. But, in the midst of these hopes, the king calling a council at Bristol, to deliberate how he was next to employ his arms, it was resolved, that the Western army should be sent back to protect the loyalists in their own counties, and that the siege of Gloucester should be forthwith undertaken. Nothing could be more fatal to the king's affairs than this last resolution; a few days after which, the earl of Newcastle sat down before Hull, where the lord Fairfax had taken refuge, after several repeated defeats; and who, assisted by one colonel Meldrum, a Scotchman, defended the place with great bravery and conduct for several weeks, though he was vigorously attacked; at last, on the eleventh of October, the besieged made a grand sally, and after a very obstinate fight, which was several times renewed, drove the besiegers from their trenches, and seized upon their cannon; whereupon Newcastle was obliged to raise the siege. The same day this sally was made by the garrison of Hull, part of the earl of Newcastle's army, commanded by the lord Widdrington, was routed at Horncastle, by the earl of Manchester, a general of the parliament's forces, who had with him Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, which latter, by a painful observance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cause, was now become a lieutenant-colonel under the parliament: he had never been in foreign service; and, if we may believe his contemporaries, his courage was rather the result of experience and reason, than the effect of his natural disposition; as he was a perfect judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite scheme, of inspiring those under him, and about him, with an enthusiasm that might overbalance all the sentiments of honour, loyalty, and duty, in the other party. How well this succeeded, the subsequent part of this history will demonstrate to us.

To the fatal siege of Gloucester the king in person, with his army, marched in the beginning of August; and about the tenth of that month he sat down before it, with about eight thousand horse and foot, and immediately ordered the approaches to be begun, which were frequently interrupted by the sallies of the besieged. The parliament greatly fearing the loss of this place, dispatched the earl of Essex instantly to its relief, who began his march from Hounslow Heath on the twenty-sixth of August. The rendezvous of his troops was at Aylesbury, where being joined by the lord Grey and reinforcements from the associated counties, he found himself at the head of eight thousand infantry, and half that number of horse; then he continued his march by Brackley, though he was a little incommoded by a detachment of the king's horse, sent on purpose to harass him with light skirmishes. He proceeded, however, with great expedition, and the king's forces abandoning their works at his approach, he entered Gloucester in triumph, when the garrison was reduced to extremity. Having supplied the city with provision, ammunition, and reinforced the garrison, he marched to Tewkesbury, whence he made a sudden motion to Cirencester, where he surprized two regiments of the royalists, and seized a great quantity of provisions prepared for the king's army: then he took his route through the northern parts of Wiltshire, having marched twenty miles before the king was informed of his motions. Prince Rupert was immediately sent after him, in order to intercept his march till the king could come up in person, with the rest of the army. This general came up with the earl as he was marching over Aubourn Chace, intending to have reached Newbury that night: a sharp conflict ensued, prince Rupert charged the earl's rear with such fury that it was put into great disorder. The marquis de la Vieuville, a French officer, who had attended the queen out of Holland, and served the king as a volunteer, was killed in this action, which, by its ill success obliged Essex to take up his quarters at Hungerford. The next day he continued his march towards Newbury, but found that the king had prevented him by two hours, and had posted himself near that town. Prince Rupert, after the action of the foregoing day (September 18), went and joined the royal army. It is certain that

Charles was possessed of advantages in consequence of this situation, which, had he known how to preserve them, must have proved decisive in his favour; but his officers had such a contempt of the London apprentices, which composed a great part of Essex's army (and whose character we have already mentioned), that, forgetting all the advantages they had, they attacked the parliamentarians in strong parties, till a general engagement became unavoidable; for Essex, finding his soldiers eager to return the affronts of the royal army, led them on in person to the fight, about six o'clock in the morning of the twentieth of September, which was continued with great gallantry on both sides till night put an end to the dispute. In this engagement, which was known by the title of the First Battle of Newbury, the royal army suffered greatly, and its loss was much aggravated by the quality of those that fell in the fight, there being slain, besides twenty officers of note, Ralph Dormer earl of Caernarvon, Henry Spencer earl of Sunderland, and Lucius Carey viscount Falkland, secretary of state, a nobleman universally respected by all who knew him, for his great parts, ingenuity, and honour; he was a zealous promoter of all endeavours towards peace between the king and parliament: he fell in the thirty-fourth year of his age. Whatever lord Clarendon may please to assert, the victory was certainly on the side of the parliament: Charles recalled his troops from the field, and left Essex to pursue his march to Reading unmolested, where he arrived, after the battle of Newbury, to be at hand to protect the city of London, the very thing Charles wanted to prevent him from doing. Upon the whole, it was no wonder if Essex, at his arrival at Reading, on the twenty-second of September, ordered public thanks to be given in the town, and was moreover welcomed with his army into London with triumphal honours by the city and parliament; while the king, with a disconcerted, disconsolate army, took up his winter quarters about Oxford. It appears, by the Journals of the House of Commons, that the faction there were unwilling their army should quit Reading; nor, indeed, does it appear to me why it was abandoned to the royalists, unless it was owing to the impatience of the Londoners to return home. Massey and the garrison of Gloucester were nobly rewarded, and the several committees were appointed to look to the recruiting the army, as if their intention had been that very winter to have attacked Oxford itself, where every thing was in the utmost confusion and despair.

During the interval between the king's laying siege to Gloucester and the battle of Newbury, several transactions happened, which we shall now briefly mention. The two houses received Waller, after the defeat in the West, with the warmest expressions of esteem: he was appointed commander in chief of the forces and militia of London; and they declared they would enable him to take the field again, to relieve their distressed friends in the West. They passed an ordinance to raise a new army under the command of the earl of Manchester, to oppose the earl of Newcastle, and protect the associated counties of Essex, Hertford, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, and Lincoln: then they sent a committee of both houses to soothe the earl of Essex, who had been for some time disgusted, and had indeed conferred with the moderate party upon expedients to force the two houses into pacific measures. Whatever arguments the committee used, he was persuaded to re-adopt their sentiments; and his other friends, fearing he would discover their design, withdrew themselves from the parliament. The earl of Portland, lord Lovelace, and lord Conway, repaired to Oxford; and their example was followed by the earl of Clare; the earls of Bedford and Holland escaped to the king's garrison at Wallingford; and the earl of Northumberland retired to his own house at Petworth, in Suffex.

While the king was employed in the siege of Gloucester, the towns of Dorchester, Weymouth, and Portland surrendered to the earl of Caernarvon, who left his army under the command of prince Maurice, and repaired to the king, in discontent for some outrages which the troops had committed with impunity. Sir John Digby routed a party of the parliament's forces at Torrington; Barnstable and Biddeford were surrendered to him without opposition; and prince Maurice undertook the siege of Exeter, which was delivered into his hands by capitulation by the earl of Stamford. About the time we are now speaking of, the parliament resolved upon a very extraordinary action, which was the making a new great-seal: this innovation was at first very warmly opposed, but at length it was resolved upon by a majority of voices in both houses; yet, to preserve some colour of decency, they passed an order, "that if the lord-keeper Littleton did not, upon summons, return with the great-seal within fourteen days, he should lose his place; and whatever should be sealed therewith by him, after that time, should be null and void in law." But this menacing vote did not bring the great-seal from Oxford, so that the new great-seal was made, and some few months afterwards the use of it authorized by ordinance of both houses.

The court of France penetrated with the helpless situation of Charles, sent the count d'Harcourt (a prince of the house of Lorraine, and a great general) as ambassador to England, to offer the mediation of France to compose the differences between the king and the parliament. He came first to London, and addressed himself to both houses for a safe-conduct to Oxford, to the king, which they granted; and on the eighteenth of October he made his entry into that city, and three days after he had a public audience in the great hall at Christ-church, where the king and queen received him with great state and magnificence; and, whilst he staid at Oxford, he and his retinue were lodged in St. John's college: but finding himself unable to effect any thing by his embassy, after a few months stay he returned.

The parliament continued still stubborn and inflexible; and, what is very extraordinary, an assembly of a few men conducted their designs with more steadiness, than a king at the head of his army. The puritans having got the majority in both houses, threw aside the mask; they entered into a solemn league with Scotland, and signed the famous Covenant with that people. By this Covenant the subscribers bound themselves to support the reformed religion in the three kingdoms; to establish a uniformity in doctrine and discipline; to extirpate popery and prelacy; to maintain the privileges of the parliament and people; to defend his majesty's person and authority, in the preservation and defence of the true religion and liberty of the kingdom; to discover and punish incendiaries and malignants; to establish a firm peace and union to all posterity; and to renounce neutrality and resist temptation: to repent of their sins, amend their lives, and vie with each other in the great work of reformation." This Covenant was read in St. Margaret's church, at Westminster, in presence of both houses, by whom it was subscribed; and the commons ordered that it should be taken the following Sunday by all persons who lived under their jurisdiction.

It was plain by this covenant that the Scottish and English puritans wanted to erect themselves into a republic: this was the spirit of Calvinism, which had long been at work in France upon the same good design; it succeeded in Holland, but in France and England this darling scheme of the people could not be effected without shedding oceans of blood. The rage of civil war was cherished by the gloomy and austere behaviour, which was affected by the puritans. The parliament took this opportunity to oblige their Scottish friends by ordering the Book of Sports, composed by king James I. to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; they thought by this action to shew their religion, and to offer a stabbing insult to the reigning prince. In the course of this year the parliament likewise ordered that each family should deprive itself of one meal in the week, and contribute the value of it for carrying on the war. One of the strongest proofs of the inflexible stiffness which had taken possession of all minds at this time, is the punishment of William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, who was condemned by the parliament, after having been four years in prison: when this prelate was brought to his trial, he made such a vigorous defence, that the commons perceiving that he could not be capitally convicted in the common course of evidence, declared him guilty of high-treason by an act of attainder; although it remains a fact upon record, that the chief crime proved upon him, was his having made use of some of the ceremonies of the Romish communion at the consecration of a church in London. He pleaded the king's pardon, which had been conveyed to him from Oxford; but it was declared null by both houses. Being sentenced to the death of a common felon, he petitioned that, as he was a bishop, a privy-counsellor, and a peer of the realm, he might be indulged with decapitation, a request which the commons granted with difficulty. He suffered on the tenth of January, 1644, in the seventy-third year of his age.

Both kingdoms having agreed to the Covenant, the states of Scotland appointed commissioners to treat with the English, concerning the aid they desired, which was that they would bring into England to their assistance an army consisting of twenty-one thousand horse and foot; towards the raising of which the parliament sent one hundred thousand pounds into Scotland, and great levies of men were made for this army, which entered England the beginning of the year 1644, and took possession of Berwick: they were commanded by Lesly, an old officer under the earl of Leven. Charles finding the parliaments of England and Scotland both united against him, and being hard pressed between the two armies, thought it necessary to conclude a truce with the Roman catholics of Ireland; and prince Maurice and the earl of Antrim were sent to Ireland to bring over two thousand troops from thence to the west of Scotland by the first of April, where they were to be joined by the king's friends, and commanded by the earl of Montrose. At the same time the marquis of Ormond was ordered to send over some of the best regiments to the west of England. Lord Byron at the head of the forces brought over from Ireland, soon reduced the castles of Howarden, Breston, Acton, and Dedington. Sir Thomas Fairfax, informed of these proceedings collected a body of four thousand men in Yorkshire, and, being reinforced by sir William Brereton, advanced against the enemy: the swelling of a rivulet, by an excessive rain, divided one part of Byron's army from the other; that part opposed to Fairfax being driven from their post, took shelter in the church of Acton, and were all made prisoners; the other fled with the utmost precipitation: and thus was dispersed and rendered useless that body of forces which had been transported from Ireland; and the parliament recovered their former footing in the north-west of England.

In the mean time the king, that he might weaken the authority of the parliament, issued a proclamation requiring the parliament to assemble at Oxford, at the same time recounting all the tumults, by which he and his partizans in both houses had been driven from London: and he thence inferred, that the assembly at Westminster was no longer a free parliament, and, till its liberty was restored, had no right to exact obedience to any of its orders. As this declaration was an obstacle to all treaty, of which, however, the king was extremely desirous, it became necessary to elude it by some kind of contrivance. A letter was accordingly sent to the earl of Essex, and subscribed by the prince, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen. They intreated him to use his endeavours for restoring peace to the country, and to promote that happy end with those by whom he was employed. Essex, though much dissatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, though apprehensive of the extremities to which they were driving, though willing to agree to any reasonable accommodation; yet was more anxious to discharge with fidelity the trust reposed in him. He replied, that as the paper sent him, was neither addressed to the two houses of parliament, nor acknowledged the authority of that assembly, he could not, by any means, impart it to them. Like proposals were repeated by the king during the ensuing campaign, and still met with a like denial from Essex.

In order to make another attempt towards a treaty, the king sent a letter directed to the lords and commons of parliament convened at Westminster: but as he likewise mentioned, in the letter, the lords and commons of parliament convened at Oxford, and expressed his desire that all the members of both houses might safely meet in a free and full assembly; the parliament, perceiving the conclusion which he meant to draw from this distinction, refused all treaty upon such terms. And the king, who despaired of all hopes of accommodation, would not forgo the pretensions, which he had assumed, nor acknowledge the two houses, more openly, for a parliament. About this time died the celebrated Pym; a man as much esteemed by one party, as hated by the other. The parliament considered considered him as the victim to national liberty, who had impaired his constitution and shortened his life by his constant and unwearied application. The royalists believed him to have been struck with an uncommon disease, and to have been consumed with vermin; as a mark of divine vengeance for his numerous crimes and treasons.

The invasion of the Scots was productive of the most important consequences. They had entered England on the nineteenth of January, with an army of eighteen thousand foot, three thousand horse, and between five and six hundred dragoons; Alexander Lesly earl of Leven was general, John Bowley lieutenant-general of the horse. Leven advanced to Newcastle, on the twenty-second of February, and having in vain summoned the town, which was defended by a strong garrison, he crossed the Tyne, to force the earl (lately created marquis) of Newcastle, who was encamped at Durham, with an army of fourteen thousand men to stop the progress of the Scottish army, and he would have succeeded in all probability but for a great misfortune which happened to his forces in Yorkshire: colonel Bellasis, whom he had left with a considerable body of troops, was entirely defeated at Selby, on the nineteenth of April, by sir Thomas Fairfax, who had returned with his victorious forces from defeating the army under the lord Byron. Apprehensive of being shut up between the two armies, Newcastle retired, and Leven joined his troops to those of lord Fairfax. They invested York, in which the army of the royalists had taken shelter: but as the Scottish and parliamentary forces were not sufficient to besiege in form so large a city, divided by a river, they contented themselves with forming a kind of blockade; and affairs remained for some time in suspense between these opposite armies.

Mean while the other parts of the kingdom were not free from the calamities of war: the lord Hopton was beat by general Waller, at Alresford, in Kent; and prince Rupert, on the other hand, gained a signal victory over the parliamentary forces who had formed the siege of Newark, under the lord Willoughby and sir John Meldrum, by which he preserved a free communication between the king's northern and southern conquests. After this the prince attacked Liverpool, a sea-port town on the edge of Cheshire, of which he made himself master: here he received a letter from the king, pressing him to relieve York, the siege of which was by this time begun, the earl of Leven and general Fairfax having been joined by the earl of Manchester, with a numerous body of infantry, who, on their march, had reduced the city of Lincoln. On the approach of prince Rupert, the parliament's generals immediately raised the siege; and drawing up their troops on Marston Moor, resolved to prevent the junction of the royalists; but prince Rupert approached the town by another side, and keeping the river Ouse between him and the enemy, safely joined his troops to those of the marquis of Newcastle. In a conference between the two generals the latter endeavoured to demonstrate that the Scots and English, being at variance, would separate in a few days of their own accord, and that he expected a reinforcement of five thousand men from the North: the prince on this occasion behaved in so imperious a manner as greatly incensed the marquis, who the next day, when the prince ordered the troops to be in readiness to engage, told him that he should not hesitate to obey his majesty's nephew, but insisted on resigning his authority, and serving only as a volunteer. On the third day of July the prince advanced against the enemy, and about two o'clock in the afternoon the action began, and lasted for some hours with great fury, and victory seemed ready to crown the efforts of the royal army, when the battle was restored by Oliver Cromwell (now made a lieutenant-general), who commanded the choice troops of the parliament, enured to danger under that undaunted leader, actuated by fanatic zeal, and regulated by the most severe discipline: in a word, after a very sharp conflict, in which the marquis of Newcastle, at the head of his regiment, performed miracles of valour, the royal army was entirely broken and dispersed, and a most complete victory was obtained by the parliament. The prince lost six thousand men, half of whom fell in the battle, together with all his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. After the battle the marquis of Newcastle, still resenting the insult he had received by the haughty carriage of prince Rupert, took shipping at Scarborough, and repaired to the continent, where he remained till the Restoration. Prince Rupert, confounded at his late overthrow, retired with the remains of his army into Lancashire abandoning York to its fate, which was in a few days yielded up to the parliament's forces by Glenham, the deputy-governor; Fairfax, entering the place, supplied it with a strong garrison, and detached a thousand horse into Lancashire, to reinforce the parliamentary army in that quarter, and attend the motions of prince Rupert: the Scottish army retired northwards, in order to meet the earl of Calender, who was coming to join them with ten thousand additional forces; and to besiege the town of Newcastle, which they took by storm: the earl of Manchester, with Cromwell, who had a capital share in gaining this great victory, and who was wounded in the action, repaired to the Eastern association, in order to recruit his army.

During these transactions in the North, the king's affairs wore a tolerable aspect in the South: two armies, under Essex and Waller, being by this time completed, those generals were ordered to advance with their combined forces towards Oxford, and, if the king took refuge in that city, to invest it, and by one enterprize finish the war. The king, leaving a sufficient garrison in Oxford, passed the enemy unnoticed, and bent his route to Worcester, and thereby the two parliament generals posted their armies between him and Oxford. The condition of Charles was now looked upon as desperate; and was certainly so, had he not been saved by the differences which, happily for him, subsisted between Essex and Waller, by the former taking upon him to prosecute the expedition to the West, which had been allotted to Waller, and ordering him to pursue Charles. Waller complained bitterly of Essex thus usurping his command, and produced his orders from the committees of both kingdoms (for the Scots were now indulged with having a committee in the English parliament, to act in conjunction with their friends there); but Essex was absolute, and threatened to try Waller by a council of war, if he should disobey. While they were debating this point, Charles got full two days march of the parliament army, and had reached

Worcester; but fearing to be shut up there by Waller, who by this time, was got as far as Evesham in pursuit of him, he went west with his army to Bewdly, as if he had intended to gain Shrewsbury, were it was practicable for him to have joined prince Rupert. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, moved towards Broomsgrove and Kidderminster, and, extending his quarters all along the east side, by degrees got between Charles and the town of Shrewsbury. By this he did the very thing which Charles wished for; for he immediately returned to Worcester, and from thence to Evesham, breaking down the bridges as he passed along, by which means he left Waller two days march behind him, in a heavy country. Upon his coming to Evesham he punished some of its magistrates for their so readily admitting Waller into that place, and marched that same day towards Camden; from whence he sent to his friends in Oxford, where he had left most of his foot in garrison, to meet him with his cannon and infantry, being determined to fight Waller if he should come up. In a few hours he was joined by his forces from Oxford, and then went in quest of Waller, in his turn. On the twenty-ninth of June the two armies approached each other at Cropedy bridge, and were only divided by the Charwell. Next day the king dislodged and proceeded towards Daven-try. Waller ordered a large detachment to cross the bridge, and attack the rear of the royalists. They were repulsed, routed, and chased to a considerable distance. Stunned and discouraged by this blow, his troops began to desert in great numbers; and the king thought he might safely leave them, and march westward against Essex.

Five days after the fight of Cropedy bridge, the king, being at Evesham, caused to be drawn up a message for peace, to both houses of parliament; a copy whereof was sent to the earl of Essex by the marquis of Hertford, to be communicated to the parliament, it being intimated that the French agent had the original to deliver, if required. This message, directed "To the Lords and Commons of Parliament, assembled at Westminster," contained a general offer to treat of peace; and if commissioners should be sent to him, he would grant them a safe-conduct. The two houses, ever jealous of the king, thought there was some artifice concealed in sending them only a copy of his message, and that his aim was to engage them to demand the original of the French agent; besides, they did not conceive themselves to be owned, by the direction of the message, as the two houses of parliament; and therefore imagined the king had a mind to reserve to himself the power of saying he did not acknowledge them for the true parliament of England; and indeed he ought not, according to his principles, since he had published the fore-mentioned declaration against them: wherefore they resolved to take no notice of the message, nor return any answer.

Essex having compelled prince Maurice, who commanded the king's forces in the West, to abandon the siege of Lyme, and having reduced Weymouth and Taunton, proceeded still in his conquests without meeting with any interruption; but hearing that the king was marching into the West against him, he retired into Cornwall, and sent to the parliament, desiring them to dispatch an army to attack the king in the rear. General

Middleton was sent with a good body of troops, for that purpose; but arrived too late to do any effectual service. On the first of August, the king entered Cornwall, where he was joined by prince Maurice with his army; and now Essex saw himself cooped up in a narrow corner, at Lestwithiel; destitute of forage and provision, and despairing of all hopes of relief, he was reduced to the last extremity. The king pressed him on one side; prince Maurice on another; sir Richard Grenville on a third. On the thirty-first of August, Essex, Robarts, and some of the principal officers, got on board a boat, and fled to Plymouth: Balfour with his cavalry escaped the king's guards in a thick mist, and arrived safely at the garrisons of his own party. The infantry, under major-general Skippon were obliged to surrender their arms, artillery, baggage, and ammunition; and, being led to the parliamentary quarters, were set at liberty.

By this time the earl (now created marquis) of Montrose, was very successful for the king in Scotland, having obtained a great victory over the Covenanters upon Newbiggin Moor, and taken Perth; and within fourteen days after that, he gained another victory near Aberdeen, soon after took that city, and marched from thence into the earl of Argyll's country, which he wasted with fire and sword, and performed many great services, even to admiration considering the smallness of his beginning, and the little assistance he had from England. But we shall leave a while the narrative of his fortune, to return to the transactions in England, which were, the remaining part of this year, prosecuted in several places with various success. In the West, after the great victory over Essex's army, Ilfracomb, Branstaple, and Saltash submitted to the king's arms; and Basing-house, which had been eighteen weeks besieged, was relieved by a party from Oxford, under sir Henry Gage: and a little after, he, with the earl of Northampton, raised the siege of Banbury castle, which had been a month invested by colonel Fiennes, and slew and took many of his men and one piece of ordnance. But the good fortune of the parliament in several parts balanced this success with advantage: Monmouth was, in September, taken by colonel Massey; and the town and castle of Newcastle, which had long sustained the utmost efforts of the English and Scottish armies, was taken by storm, to the great loss of the assailants, on the twenty-seventh of October; and a while after Liverpool, in Lancashire, was surrendered to sir John Meldrum. But the great business that concluded this year were the important battle of Newbury and the treaty at Uxbridge, which will come next to be related, interwoven with some other of the most remarkable occurrences that then happened.

Though the earl of Essex might have been justly upbraided for the two errors he had committed, in obstinately pursuing his march into the West, contrary to the orders of both houses, and preposterously going into Cornwall, he was not insulted for his misfortunes, but, at his return, was very civilly received: it was then no proper time to examine his conduct, the point was to recruit and arm his ruined army, as well as that of Waller; and accordingly both houses applied themselves to it with all possible diligence. They ordered also colonel Middleton to repair speedily to the earl of Essex's army, and the earl of Manchester to march the

the same way with his forces. On the twenty-first of October the three armies joined, and were far superior to that of the king, who was by this time come out of the West, and was advanced as far as Newbury, while the parliament forces lay at Reading. Essex, either through disgust or indisposition, or both, absented himself, on the twenty-third from the parliament army, and there was little or no unanimity in their counsels: however, the proximity of the opposite armies would not permit them to be long inactive; and on the twenty-seventh of October was fought the second battle of Newbury, one of the most obstinate that had happened during the whole course of this war. The royalists were defeated: the loss on Charles's side, however, was not very considerable; the parliament lost about a thousand men. After the battle the king retreated to Wallingford, from whence he marched to Bath, near which place he was joined by prince Rupert, and then they put their troops into winter-quarters, as did the parliament on their side.

Oliver Cromwell, who had already signalized himself by several acts of extraordinary valour, was a great instrument of gaining the late advantage over the king's army. It is said, that at this battle of Newbury, the corps, commanded by the earl of Manchester, having given way, the earl likewise being carried along with the rest in their precipitate flight, Cromwell, who was himself wounded, rode up to him, and cried "You are mistaken, my lord, the enemy is not this way," and immediately brought him back to the charge: in a word, most writers agree, that the fortune of this day was chiefly owing to Cromwell. This is certain, that Cromwell had as much influence in the house of commons as he had reputation in the army; and publicly accused his general of not having done his duty.

While these things were transacting, the queen retired into France; and the elector Palatine, who had withdrawn to Holland in the beginning of the troubles between the king (his uncle) and the parliament, came over in the month of August, and put himself under the protection of the parliament; the king hearing of it, wrote to him, to know the reason of so extraordinary a proceeding. It does not appear what answer the elector returned; but probably, not knowing how to subsist, and considering the king (his uncle) was not able to maintain him, he believed he should find more assistance in the parliament, which had ever expressed a great affection for his house. He was not deceived in his expectations, for the parliament granted him an honourable pension, which was more regularly paid than the former from the king. He afterwards desired, and obtained leave, to hear the debates in the assembly of the divines: probably, he did not care to be concerned in military affairs, but sought to spend his time in conversing with the learned, and improving himself in matters of religion.

Amongst the many tentatives for peace this summer, one was made by the States General, whose ambassadors came to London about the sixth of July. Upon their arrival, they wrote (being three in number, Boreel, de Reede, and Joachimim) to the speaker of the house of commons, to demand an immediate audience in full parliament. As they had addressed the letter to him as speaker of the commons of England, and as their credentials ran in the same stile, the commons were so well pleased, that they ordered them a very splendid introduction, with no less than ten coaches to attend them to both houses, and in their audience they offered the mediation of their masters between the king and his parliament: at the same time, they complained of the detention of some of their ships by those of the parliament; and the whole, after a very ceremonious audience, was referred to a committee of both houses. Those maritime differences seem to have been very complicated, and of so great importance, that neither side chose to proceed, at this time, in the mediation; till they were previously settled.

The fondness of the English for every thing new or strange, brought to light, the latter end of this year, a new scheme of a most extraordinary nature, and which perfectly explained Cromwell's true character, and proved at once the source of his greatness, the downfall of the parliament and hierarchy, the murder of the king, and the abolition of monarchy. The sect of independents began now to make some noise*. The most violent of the presbyterians had joined this sect, which resembled that of the quakers, in condemning the ordination of ministers, and allowing every one to preach and expound the scriptures according to the talents he had received from nature; but they were at the same time as turbulent as the quakers were mild and peaceable. They gave a loose to the wildest imaginations they had formed, the extravagant design of levelling all distinctions among men, and, in order to establish this projected equality, they had recourse to force, which ever implies a superiority on the one side. Oliver Cromwell looked upon these people as fit instruments to be made use of in the great plan he was mediating.

The city of London, which was divided into several factions, complained bitterly that the parliament had loaded it with all the burthen of the war; and not only so, but that they had of late greatly neglected the city. This circumstance occasioned some warm debates in the house of commons; and Cromwell took the opportunity to expose, with great freedom, the licentiousness and ill government of the army, the officers of which, he said, could not well be called to an account, by reason that most of them were members of the house of commons. He then made a motion for taking into consideration the new modelling the army; in which he was warmly seconded by Sir Harry Vane, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, and Oliver St. John, the solicitor-general, all of them furious independents. In order to effect this scheme, it was proposed that the members of both houses should resign all their employments, civil and military. Almost all the offices of profit were in the hands of the members of one or the other house; the three generals of the parliament's army were peers*; the greatest part of the colonels, majors, the treasurers, the purveyors, and commissioners of all departments, were members of the lower-house. How improbable then did it appear, that so many persons in power could be prevailed upon, by the soothing of a religious cant, to resign their posts and incomes; and yet this was effected in a very short space of time: the commons, in particular, were dazzled with the prospect of gaining an ascendancy over the minds of the people, by this rare example of disinterestedness. The lords, at first, refused to concur in passing the bill, but were soon overpowered by the commons; and on the nineteenth of December, this year, was passed the act called, the Self-denying Ordinance, by which the members of either house were deprived of all offices whether civil or military, except a few, which were particularly mentioned. The earls of Essex, Denbigh, Manchester, and the lord Fairfax, finding they could not stem the torrent, voluntarily resigned their commands; and the army, being augmented to twenty-two thousand men, the chief command was bestowed on sir Thomas Fairfax, he not being a member of parliament.

This was just what Cromwell wanted; he had an absolute ascendancy over this new general, as indeed he had over the whole house of commons, who continued him in the command of his regiment, notwithstanding he was a member; and even ordered the general to give him the command of a detachment of horse, which was directed to march to Oxford. This very man, who had so artfully deprived all the presbyterian members of their military employments, had likewise the address to get the independent party continued in their posts; and thus the latter, though much inferior in number, obtained a complete victory over the presbyterians; and from that time it was easy to perceive that the army could give law to the parliament; for though the power of the sword was, in appearance, conferred on Fairfax, in reality it rested with Cromwell. By his assistance Fairfax new modelled his whole army, incorporated some regiments into others, made a total change in all the military departments, and established a new discipline. All this, which at any other time would have excited a revolt, now passed without the least resistance.

In the mean time, a treaty of peace was begun and carried on between the king and parliament, but with little hopes of success. Upon his majesty's return to Oxford, after putting his army in winter quarters, the two houses required and procured a safe-conduct for their deputies, with proposals of accommodation, which they had framed in the summer. Charles, on their being presented to him, required, in his turn, a safe-conduct for the duke of Richmond and the earl of Southampton, who should carry his answer to the two houses; but this favour he could not obtain, until he had addressed himself to them by the title of The two Houses of Parliament assembled at Westminster, and to the Scottish Commissioners. On this occasion, Charles employed an artifice which does no honour to his sincerity, and which his warmest advocates will find it difficult to justify or excuse. He entered a secret protest in his council-book, importing, that though he had called them a parliament, he did not acknowledge them as such. This spirit of equivocation had always brought ruin upon Charles's affairs, and was indeed shameful. On the nineteenth of December, the parliament and the Scottish commissioners returned their answer to the king, in which they consented to a treaty. Uxbridge, a town betwixt London and Oxford, was named for the place of treaty, and Charles, on his part, appointed the following commissioners: the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earl of Southampton, the earl of Kingston, the earl of Chichester, the lord Capel, the lord Seymour, the lord Hatton, the lord Culpepper, secretary Nicholas, Mr. chancellor of the Exchequer, sir Edward Hyde, the lord chief-baron, sir Edward Lane, sir Orlando Bridgeman, sir Thomas Gardiner, Mr. Joseph Ashburnham, Mr. Geoffery Palmer, Dr. Steuart, and their attendants; in all, the number of one hundred and eight. The commissioners for the parliament were, Algernoon earl of Northumberland, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, William earl of Salisbury, Basil earl of Denbigh, Thomas lord viscount Wenman, Denzil Holles, William Peirpoint, sir Henry Vane, junior, Oliver St. John, Bulstrode Whitlock, John Crew, and Edward Prideaux, for the lords and commons assembled in the parliament of England, at Westminster; and John earl of Loudon, lord chancellor of Scotland, Archibald marquis of Argyll, John lord Maitland, John lord Balmerino, sir Archibald Johnson, sir Charles Erskine, George Dundas, sir Joseph Smith, sir Hugh Kennedy, and Mr. Robert Berkley, for the estates of the parliament of Scotland, together with Mr. Alexander Henderson.

The conferences were opened on the thirtieth of January, 1645; by mutual agreement they were to last twenty days; and the propositions were reduced to the three articles, of religion, the militia, and Ireland. The propositions offered by the two houses were no other than the most severe conditions they could have imposed upon a prince, whom they intended to strip of all the power, and indeed of all the ensigns, of royalty. In a word, they demanded that the hierarchy should be abolished, and presbyterianism established in both kingdoms; that the king should subscribe the covenant; abandon his best friends as traitors; give up the militia, and even his own children, to the direction of the two houses; which engrossed the whole sovereign authority. Though no peace was to be expected from such proposals, the king's commissioners, in the course of the conferences, agreed that every person should enjoy liberty of conscience touching the ceremonies of the church; that no bishop should exercise any sort of jurisdiction; that no person should be admitted into holy orders without the consent of the presbytery; that episcopal jurisdiction, with respect to marriages and wills, should be regulated by the king and the two houses; that proper laws should be enacted for the regulation of episcopal visitations, the expence of ecclesiastical suits, frivolous excommunications, and other abuses of the spiritual courts; that the militia should be put into the hands of twenty commissioners, one-half to be named by the king, and the other by the two houses; and, that the commission should continue for three years. These concessions were deemed not satisfactory by the two houses: nothing material was proposed relating to the affairs of Ireland, and the twenty days being expired, the conferences broke up without having produced any prospect of accommodation.

The disposition of the forces on both sides, at the beginning of the year 1645, was as follows: part of the Scottish army was engaged in reducing Pomfret, and other towns in Yorkshire; part of it invested Carlisle, bravely defended by sir Thomas Glenham. Chester, where Byron commanded, had been long besieged by sir William Brereton, and was now almost on the point of surrendering. The king, reinforced by the princes Rupert and Maurice, lay at Oxford, with an army of fifteen thousand men. Fairfax and Cromwell were stationed at Windsor, with the new-modelled army of twenty-two thousand men. Taunton, in the county of Somerset, defended by Blake, sustained a long siege from sir Richard Grenville, who headed an army of eight thousand men; and though the defence had been very vigorous, the garrison was now destitute of almost every necessary. Goring, in the West, conducted an army of nearly the same number.

The parliament's army was by this time new modelled according to the plan of Cromwell, and was composed entirely of a set of fanatics, inspired with that blaze of enthusiasm which makes men fight with the most eager zeal, even in the worst of causes, and die in full confidence of obtaining the crown of martyrdom. It was with a detachment of such warriors that Cromwell marched from Windsor, on the twenty-fourth day of April. In the neighbourhood of Ilip, he cut in pieces four regiments of the king's cavalry; Buckingham was surrendered to him, at the first summons, by colonel Windebank (son to the secretary of that name), who was thereupon tried by a court-martial, and shot for cowardice; but Cromwell was repulsed in his attack upon Farringdon. Taunton, besieged by sir Richard Grenville, was relieved by colonel Welden, one of the parliament's officers, with a body of horse and foot; but sir Richard, being afterwards reinforced by a strong party under Goring, he resumed his operations against the place, in which the detachment under Welden was now shut up. The king opened the campaign on his side, by marching with about eight thousand men towards Chester, to relieve that place, besieged by sir William Brereton; but hearing by the way the siege was raised, he marched to Leicester, which he took by storm, on the thirtieth of May. Here Charles received advice, that Fairfax was ordered to besiege Oxford; he therefore marched to Harborough, where he was informed that general had abandoned his design upon Oxford, and had been repulsed with great loss in assaulting the garrison of Borsal-house (in Buckinghamshire). The king continued his march, in expectation of being joined by colonel Gerard, with two thousand men from Wales; as well as by Goring, at the head of three thousand cavalry. In this situation of affairs, prudence seemed to dictate the waiting for the coming up of these supplies, and, till then, to act only on the defensive; but the head-strong and impetuous temper of prince Rupert, and the fiery and impatient humour of the young nobility under Charles, rendered fruitless the advice of the more grave and experienced officers of the council; and it was resolved, by a majority of voices in the cabinet, to attack Fairfax. The royal army accordingly marched back; and, on the fourteenth day of June, came in sight of the enemy, who were drawn up in order of battle, on a rising ground in the neighbourhood of Naseby, a village near Rothwell, in Northamptonshire.

At this place was fought, with forces nearly equal, that great and important battle between the king and parliament. The main body of the royalists was headed by the king, the right wing by prince Rupert, the left by sir Marmaduke Langdale. Fairfax, assisted by Skippon, commanded the main body of the parliamentarians; Cromwell conducted the right wing: Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, the left. The charge was begun by prince Rupert, with his usual impetuosity, and his usual success: notwithstanding the brave resistance of Ireton, who, even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, still continued to fight with undaunted courage, till he was taken prisoner, that whole wing was totally broke, and chased to a considerable distance by Rupert: he was even so imprudent as to waste time in attacking the artillery of the parliament, which had been left behind with a strong guard of infantry. Mean while the king, at the head of his main body, attacked Fairfax and Skippon; and the fight was, for some time, maintained with equal bravery on both sides. Skippon, being dangerously wounded, was desired by Fairfax to quit the field; but declared he would not retire so long as one man kept his ground. At last the infantry of the parliament was thrown into disorder, and hard pushed by the king; till Fairfax, with great prudence, brought up the reserve, and restored the battle. By this time Cromwell, with his right wing, having fallen upon Langdale, had repulsed the royalists, and by his conduct improved that advantage, which he had obtained by his valour. Having chased the enemy about a quarter of a mile, and detached some troops to continue the pursuit, he turned back upon the king's infantry; and, at the first onset, threw them into the utmost confusion. One regiment alone, though twice assaulted by Fairfax, still maintained its ranks unbroken; and that general, provoked at so stubborn a resistance, commanded Doyley, the captain of his life-guards, to assail them once more in front, while he himself attacked attacked them in rear. By these united efforts the regiment was broke. Fairfax, with his own hands, slew an ensign, and having taken the colours, gave them to a soldier to keep for him. The soldier afterwards pretending that he had gained the spoil himself, was reprimanded by Doyley, who had seen the action: "Let him retain that honour (said Fairfax) I have to-day acquired enough beside."

Prince Rupert, convinced too late of his error, abandoned the fruitless attack on the enemy's artillery, and returned to the king, whose infantry was now totally defeated. Charles endeavoured to animate this body of cavalry to a fresh attack, and cried aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But the danger of such an attempt was too great and apparent; and they could by no means be persuaded to renew the battle. At the same time, the Scottish earl of Carnwarth, who rode by his majesty's side, seizing the bridle of his horse, turned him round, saying, "Will you go upon your death in an instant." The troops seeing this motion, wheeled off to the right, and immediately fled with the utmost precipitation. Charles, finding it impossible to make any farther resistance, was obliged to quit the field, and abandon the victory to his enemies. The number of killed on the side of the parliament was greater than on the side of the king: they lost a thousand men; he not above eight hundred. But Fairfax took five hundred officers, and four thousand private men, prisoners; seized all the king's artillery and baggage, and totally dispersed his infantry: so that no victory could be well more complete, than that which was now obtained by the parliament.*

It would be as irksome as improper, in this history, to enter upon a detail of all the little actions and skirmishes, the sieges of castles, and the taking of houses, that happened during this active year. Let it suffice then to inform the reader, that Charles, having escaped from the fatal field of Naseby, gathered together some part of his scattered forces, but never was able to make head against the conquerors; losing this year one garrison after another, till his whole strength was almost reduced to Oxford. We shall only mention some of the principal places taken from him by the victorious parliamentarians, namely, Leicester, Carlisle, Pomfret castle, Bridgewater, Scarborough, Hereford, West Chester, and Bristol; on which a great part of his affairs chiefly depended. This latter place was well supplied with men, provisions, and ammunition; and every body concluded, from the known valour of prince Rupert, that he would make a very vigorous defence. He even wrote to the king, that he should be able to hold out four months, unless mutiny should compel him to surrender. Notwithstanding this promise, and the general expectation, he offered to capitulate at the first summons; and actually delivered up the place before the besiegers had begun to make their approaches. The unhappy monarch, in the first transports of his grief, ordered his nephew to quit the kingdom, and revoked all his commissions.

During these transactions, the unfortunate king underwent a surprising series of dangers, mortifications, and distresses, which he bore with uncommon fortitude and dignity. Amongst his other misfortune was that of losing his cabinet of papers, which was taken from the lord Digby, in an engagement near Newark, and sent up to the parliament; and from which they made great discoveries to the king's prejudice. It was no little aggravation to the calamities which Charles suffered, that his forlorn estate encouraged some of his principal officers to forget all respect to the person of their general and their sovereign; of which the following is a melancholy instance. While Charles lay at Newark, on his march back to Oxford, prince Rupert and prince Maurice, with a train of their friends and officers, contrary to the express orders of Charles, came to that town, and even forced their way into his presence, with an intention that prince Rupert might be cleared for the surrender of Bristol. Charles thought proper to suffer a council of war to acquit him both of cowardice and treachery; but as he behaved to the prince with great coldness, the latter entered into a conspiracy with sir Richard Willis, the governor of Newark, who was so extremely disagreeable to the gentlemen of the county, that Charles was forced to give his government to the lord Bellasis. Though Charles was so far from intending this as any affront to Willis, that he had appointed him to command his life-guards, in the room of the earl of Litchfield, who had been killed at Chester; yet, it was so far resented by him, the two princes, and all his friends, that they broke into the king's bed-chamber in a body, and demanded public reparation for the injury that had been done to Willis, in taking from him his command. Charles behaved on this occasion with so great spirit and presence of mind, that the mutineers were ashamed of what they had done, and left his presence covered with confusion. Charles, next day sent them passes, to carry them wheresoever they would go. After their departure, he put in execution an admirable plan: he had formed his retreat to Oxford, at which city he arrived, through infinite dangers and difficulties, in the beginning of November.

The year 1646 began as unfortunately for Charles as the preceding one had concluded. After the reduction of Bristol, Fairfax and Cromwell having divided their forces, the former marched westward, in order to finish the conquest of Devonshire and Cornwall, where the prince of Wales commanded the royal forces. After a rapid and uninterrupted success, during which he twice obliged the prince of Wales to retreat before him, he at length obtained a complete victory over the lord Hopton, at Farrington, on the tenth of February; and, pushing that nobleman in his retreat, he improved the advantage he had gained, cooped up the royalists in Truro, and compelled the whole army, amounting to five thousand men, chiefly cavalry, to surrender, on the fourteenth of March, upon terms: then laying siege to Exeter, he obliged that city to capitulate on the ninth of April. This finished the conquest of the West. And the victorious Fairfax returned with his army to the center of the kingdom, and pitched his camp at Newbury. The king, seeing his affairs irretrievably ruined, wrote to the prince of Wales, to consult his own safety by flying the kingdom; and accordingly the young prince withdrew to Scilly, then to Jersey, from whence he went to Paris, where he found the queen his mother, who had escaped thither from Exeter, at the time the earl of Essex first led the parliamentary forces into the West.

In the mean while, Montrose, who acted for the king in Scotland, having penetrated into the southern counties, the covenanters, having collected their whole force, opposed him with a numerous army, and gave him battle at Kilsyth, but without success. This was the most important victory which Montrose ever gained. The royalists killed above six thousand of their enemies, and left them no appearance of an army in Scotland. The whole kingdom was rent with these repeated convulsions; and many noblemen, who were secretly attached to the royal cause, now espoused it openly, when they saw a force able to support them. The marquis of Douglas, the earls of Anandale and Hartfield, the lords Fleming, Seton, Maderty, Carnegy, with many others, immediately joined the royal army: Edinburgh opened its gates to them, and released all the prisoners whom the covenanters had confined in that city: amongst the rest was the lord Ogilvy, son to Airly, whose family had a principal share in the victory gained at Kilsyth.

The covenanters, alarmed at the rapid progress of Montrose, recalled David Lesley from the army in England; and this able general immediately repaired to the relief of his distressed friends in Scotland. Montrose continued to penetrate still farther into the southern provinces, encouraged by the vain hopes of exciting to arms the earls of Hume, Traquair, and Roxborough, who had engaged to assist him, and of procuring from England some supplies of cavalry, which he much wanted: but Lesley, at Philip-hough, in the Forest, came suddenly upon him, and obliged him to give battle. After a sharp conflict, in which Montrose performed the most heroic acts of valour, his troops were entirely defeated by Lesley's cavalry, and he himself forced to fly, with the scattered remains of his army, into the mountains; where he again prepared himself for attempting some new enterprize.

After all these repeated calamities, which every where befel the royal party, there remained only one body of troops on which fortune could exercise her cruelty. Lord Astley, with a small army of three thousand men, chiefly cavalry, was advancing to Oxford, in order to reinforce the king; when he was encountered, at a place called Donnington, near Stow on the Would, on the twenty-first of March, by colonel Morgan, by whom he was entirely routed, and himself taken prisoner; and, with him, all the king's hopes of preserving Oxford, till he could better his condition, were lost.

It is now time to see what passed in the Scottish army, whilst the parliament forces were employed in reducing the places which held for the king in the southern and western parts of the kingdom. The Scots, having taken Newcastle in October, 1644, divided themselves into two bodies, one whereof besieged Carlisle, which surrendered upon articles in June, 1645.

The other part of the army durst not engage in a siege, because the marquis of Montrose, who served the king in Scotland, having had great success there, it was to be feared the king would be sending him reinforcements; wherefore the Scots always kept in a readiness to oppose it. This became still more necessary after the battle of Naseby; there being great likelihood of the king's resolving to join the earl of Montrose with his cavalry. Besides, the Scots, by keeping thus in the middle of the kingdom, prevented the king from making new levies in those parts. At last, after the taking of Carlisle, the two bodies being joined, they besieged Hereford, about the end of July; but, after having in vain carried on the siege above a month, they raised it in the beginning of September. The earl of Leven, their general, published, upon this occasion, a sort of apology, wherein, amongst other things, he said, that for six or seven months past, they had received but one month's pay; that they had been promised to be supplied with all things necessary for a siege; in which they had been extremely disappointed, since they had received but three pieces of cannon, with fifty balls to each; that they had but few horse; and being informed the king was marching towards them with three thousand horse, it was impossible to continue the siege. Lastly, that general Lesley was obliged to go into Scotland with his whole party of horse and dragoons, to oppose Montrose.

After the siege of Hereford was raised, the Scotch army retired into Yorkshire, complaining pretty openly of being entirely neglected; whereupon the parliament assigned them thirty thousand pounds, provided they appeared before Newark upon the first of November; and ordered that the eastern association should pay them fourteen hundred pounds a week. The Scots agreeing to these terms, the siege of Newark was begun about the end of October, 1645, and lasted till May, 1646.

The king, during the whole course of the preceding winter, and great part of this spring, was in the most wretched and deplorable situation; all the attempts which he made for a reasonable accommodation with the parliament, answered no other purpose, than to shew that victory was entirely in their hands, and that they were determined to use it as conquerors. From the fifteenth of December to the twenty-third of March following, Charles had sent nine or ten messages to the parliament, with offers of peace; and for the better accomplishment thereof, he even proposed to have a personal treaty with them at Westminster. At last, on the thirtieth of March, a message came to him from the parliament, in which they told him, "That it would be unsafe for him then to return to Westminster, until he had assented to the propositions which they were framing," &c. And, to prevent his coming to London without their knowledge and consent, they voted, "That if the king should come, or attempt to come, within the lines of communication, that then the committee of the militia of London should have power, and were thereby enjoined, to apprehend and secure such as should come with him, to prevent resort unto him, and to secure his person."

Fairfax was all this time advancing with a numerous army, and, it was well known, with an intention to form the siege of Oxford, which must of necessity fall into his hands. In this most dreadful situation, no wonder that he embraced a measure which at any other time would have been looked upon as foolish or imprudent. Monsieur Montreuil, the French ambassador, had always espoused the king's interest with all the warmth of humanity that his station would admit; he had lately founded the Scottish generals and commissioners, who were greatly disgusted at the treatment they had met with from the parliament; and as the presbyterians were great enemies to the independent party, who now assumed the management of all affairs, he had received many general promises and professions of their affection to their distressed sovereign, and their inclination to protect him, if he thought fit to place his confidence in them. In consequence of the report of Montreuil, and by his earnest advice, Charles was induced to adopt the resolution of quitting Oxford, and repairing to the Scottish army, which at that time lay before Newark. Accordingly, on the night of the twenty-seventh of April, this year, he left Oxford in disguise, attended by Mr. Ashburnham, and one Hudson, a clergyman, who knew the bye ways; and after travelling, in the garb of their servant, a great deal of the country, he arrived, on the fifth of May, at the Scottish camp.

The Scottish generals and commissioners were confounded at the sudden appearance of his majesty; they, however, behaved as well as could be expected. The earl of Leven received him respectfully; and general Pointz, who commanded the English forces before Newark, was so apprehensive of their intentions, that he cut off the communication between his and the Scottish camp. The Scottish commissioners, however, were excessively puzzled how to behave; but, at last, they resolved to join in a letter with the earl of Leven, informing the parliament of the king's being in their hands. The parliament, before they received this letter, or another from Pointz, to the same purpose, knew of the king's escape from Oxford, but being ignorant how he directed his course, they passed several severe votes against concealing his person, and against all his party who should be found within the lines of circumvallation about London.

Charles had little reason to be satisfied with his condition; he was so narrowly watched, under the shew of respectful attendance on his person, that not one of his friends could get to the speech of him in private. The Scottish generals represented to him, that it would be proper, for the safety of his person, for the army to remove farther North, and that as this could not be done before the reduction of Newark, they desired him to order that town to surrender. The king, persuaded by this reason, gave orders to lord Bellasis, the governor, to surrender; which was accordingly done, on the ninth of May; and then the Scottish army decamped, and marched with the king to Newcastle. Here they desired him to send orders to Oxford, and all his other garrisons, both in England and Scotland, to submit to the parliament; and the king, conscious that it was in vain to make any resistance, readily complied with their request. His orders were readily obeyed; and thus was concluded a most cruel war, which had now continued almost four years, during which, the British nations had been engaged, by their civil and religious quarrels, in shedding the blood of their friends and relations, and in wasting and destroying their native country.

We must not forget to mention, that Montrose, after a variety of other attempts, in which he sometimes failed, and sometimes succeeded, threw down his arms and abandoned the kingdom.

I shall not here trouble the reader with the numerous manifestos and declarations that passed between the Scottish army and the parliament, on the subject of the king; nor their disputes about the disposal of his person; nor with the repeated concessions of the latter towards bringing his rebellious subjects to some equitable terms, for restoring the tranquility of the nation, which were as often rejected with the most inexcusable insolence on the part of the independents, now the prevailing faction in both houses: I shall only observe, that the life of the unfortunate Charles now hurried to its catastrophe.

As the Scots agreed with the parliament in enforcing all the severe conditions they required of the king, it is not probable that they ever really intended to set him at liberty; nor indeed, had they been so inclined, could they have carried their scheme into execution: they therefore resolved to deliver him up to his English subjects, but not, however till they had obtained those arrears to which they laid claim, and which they were not likely, in the present situation of affairs, to procure by any other expedient. After much debate and controversy, concerning the demands of the Scots, which were very exorbitant, it was agreed by the house of commons to give them four hundred thousand pounds, one half to be paid immediately, and the other within a twelvemonth. This agreement, which was accepted on the part of the Scots, passed the house on the sixteenth of December, by a majority of one hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and one; for the independents opposed every vote for getting rid of the Scots by way of treaty, adopting the maxim of Camillus, the Roman general, that it was for the dignity of their country to drive out an unwelcome guest rather by steel than by gold. Matters being thus compromised between the Scots and the English, and the first payment of the money being made at Newcastle, according to the compact, the former delivered the royal captive, on the thirtieth of January, to the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montagu, sir James Harrington, sir John Holland, sir Walter Erle, sir John Cook, Mr. Crew, and major-general Brown, who were appointed by the parliament their commissioners to receive him. The two houses had voted that his majesty should reside at his house at Holmby, in the county of Northampton, where he arrived on the sixteenth of February, 1647. The commissioners had instructions to keep the king close prisoner, and to send to Fairfax for what forces were necessary for that purpose. All this was opposed by the independents, who wanted that he should, without any other ceremony, be delivered up to Skippon. His majesty was allowed no more than nine servants, and those of the parliament's choosing, to attend him: he was treated by the commissioners and sir Thomas Fairfax, who escorted him from Newcastle to Holmby, with all the marks of outward respect; but very strict care was taken to deprive him of all intercourse with his friends, which

Charles often attempted privately, but was as often disappointed by the vigilance of the committee. The parliament of Scotland sent up a declaration consenting to his residing at Holmby, or in any other of his houses near London, "provided (say they) no violence should be offered to his person; that no new change should be made in the government; and that his posterity should suffer no prejudice in their succession to the throne of England."

The Scots having now completely done their business, marched from Newcastle, which was taken possession of by an English garrison; and shortly after they put Berwick and Carlisle into the parliament's hands, and marched quietly home to Scotland.

All the writers in the royal cause have represented this transaction of the Scots as highly injurious to the character of that nation, as if they had sold their king to his inveterate enemies, and bargained the life of their sovereign for money. That the delivery of this ill-fated prince to the two houses was a private stipulation between them and the English parliament, is scarce to be questioned: that it was criminal in the Scots, must in some measure be allowed; but the candour and impartiality which ought ever to be the guide of the historian, obliges me to observe, that what has chiefly rendered this measure odious, are the fatal consequences with which it was at last attended; and that it ought to be remembered, that these consequences were neither natural nor necessary, nor, indeed, at this time probable: neither the Scots, nor the majority of the English parliament themselves had the least intention of proceeding to the violent extremities which were afterwards pursued. It was, as a modern writer* very justly observes, the independents, determined enemies both to the king, the parliament, and the Scots, who twice seized the king by force, and at last brought him to a cruel and ignominious death, at the very time when the Scots and the presbyterians, which latter now composed the majority in parliament, were exerting their utmost endeavours, and even risking their lives and fortunes by rising in arms, in order to restore him to his throne.

Pitiable indeed was now the condition of the fallen Charles, and of his family. His queen was in France; his eldest son, after being a vagabond between Cornwall, Jersey, and Scilly, had been delivered into the hands of the same perfidious neighbours; his second and third sons (the dukes of York and Gloucester), with the princess Henrietta, his youngest daughter, were prisoners in London, subsisting on a scanty pension allowed them by their enemies: the princes Rupert and Maurice, after leaving Newark, wandered from place to place, ashamed of abandoning their uncle and generous benefactor, and retired to Oxford, where they had the benefit of the capitulation of that city, and retired beyond sea. He himself was immured by the detested rebels; denied all the comforts of this life, and even that which his soul most loved, the exercise of religion according to his own faith; for we are told, that not any of his chaplains were suffered to have access to him, nor so much as a Common Prayer Book allowed him for his own private use.

During the king's residence in the Scottish camp, died the earl of Essex, the discarded but still popular and powerful general of the parliament. His death at this critical juncture was a great loss to the public, and made it easier for Cromwell to carry on the destructive designs he had concerted; for doubtless, had Essex lived, he would have exerted all his influence and authority, to give a check to the fury that was going to prevail.

The parliament having now the person of the king in their possession, and all his armies and garrisons subdued by their forces, were rioting in the fulness of power: nor could the most frantic among them form a wish which they did not enjoy. But dissention, the never-failing attendant on anarchy and misrule, soon made its way among them, and blasted all their towering prospects.

Cromwell and his independents were now masters of the soldiery, who no longer looked upon themselves as servants to the parliament, but as its lawgivers. Fairfax, who had been the unhappy, and, as far as appears, the unwilling instrument of his country's misery, was not proof against the arts of Cromwell, who, on every occasion, molded him to his purpose. The parliament, though still all powerful in London, had, for some time, been apprehensive that the army was aiming at the supreme authority, and therefore wanted to get rid of these troublesome servants; an opportunity now seemed to offer, convenient for effecting their design: the troops in almost all parts of the kingdom made loud complaints for money, and the army under Cromwell especially backed their remonstrances with somewhat that looked like threatening; hereupon that whole body was threatened to be sent to Ireland; and the presbyterian faction in the house politically suffered them to live at free quarters, that the disbanding them, which was resolved upon, might be less unpopular, though they received little or nothing of their arrears†.

The head-quarters of the army was at St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, while these matters were debating in parliament. Cromwell looked upon this as the critical minute for perfecting his great designs: nevertheless he continued to practise the most exquisite dissimulation in the house; he smote his breast; he threw up his eyes; he shed tears; and poured out such a torrent of passionate asseverations concerning his fidelity to the house, the patience and resignation of the army under their oppressions, and the unwearied labours which he and his associates had employed in making them easy, that he imposed even on those who had themselves been thoroughly versed in the same arts: he recommended every severe expedient for repressing the mutiny which now began to encrease among the soldiery; and by these desperate counsels, he at once seemed to prove his own sincerity, and increased those discontents which he proposed to convert to his own advantage. In the mean time he

† It will perhaps amaze the reader to know, that the horse and dragoons were no less than forty-three weeks in arrears, amounting to two hundred and fifty-two thousand seven hundred and fifty-six pounds; and the foot eighteen weeks, amounting to seventy-eight thousand two hundred and fifty pounds; in all three hundred and thirty-one thousand pounds. See Journ. of the House of Com. March 26. I mention this important particular, because most historians have adopted a wild notion, as if the army without any provocation, had all of a sudden started out in rebellion against the parliament.

carefully pointed out to Fairfax, the divisions and distractions both in church and state; he represented to him, that the army was now the only principle of unity, and the center to which all lines must point; that the soldiers were the chosen of God, and had with them that unerring light of grace which set at nought all sublunary institutions, and corrected all human errors: in a word, he engaged Fairfax to countenance a petition from the army against their being disbanded.

Matters stood thus between the parliament and army when the former, encouraged by the assurances they had from Cromwell, Jackson, Skippon, and other officers, of the fidelity of their respective troops, determined, by one bold stroke, to attempt to preserve their authority. Accordingly on the twenty-first of May, eleven regiments were voted to be disbanded, at different times and places, under the direction of Fairfax and Skippon; and that the others should be sent to Ireland. Instead of the obedience which the parliament flattered itself would have been paid to this decree, a council of officers met at St. Edmundsbury, to consider thereof; at the same time ten soldiers out of each regiment of horse and foot were chosen as agitators (or agents) for their respective regiments; and these all consulting together, it was unanimously resolved not to submit to this decree; and the council of the army appointed a general rendezvous for all the regiments, in order to provide for their common safety. The independent party began now to prevail more and more in parliament, and the presbyterians were so much intimidated, that many of them joined with the former in giving a commission to Cromwell to go to the head-quarters of the army, in order to quiet the dissatisfied soldiers; and a declaration was issued, that if the subscribers to the petition against disbanding the army, should proceed no farther in their opposition to that measure, now resolved upon by the house, they should be retained in the parliament's good graces; and that those who should continue their present disorderly conduct, should be proceeded against as enemies to the state.

In the mean time the council of agitators struck a blow of the last importance, and which must be allowed to be the most sensible measure that men in their circumstances could pursue. They thought they had as much right as the parliament to be jailors to the king, and that his person was the only pledge they could have for their safety, in their design of coming to an open rupture with their masters. This was suggested by the genius of Cromwell, who endeavoured to persuade the agitators (who were a body of men distinct from the council of war, and acted for the common soldiers), to take both the glory and the danger of the enterprise. Accordingly, on the fourth of June, a party of five hundred horse was detached in private to Holmby (where the king then resided), under the command of one Joyce, who, before the commencement of the war, had followed the trade of a taylor, but was now raised to the rank of a cornet, and was an active agitator in the army. Though it was late at night when they arrived, and the king was gone to bed, Joyce, having gained admission into the house, went with very little ceremony into the king's room, with a pistol in his hand, and told his majesty he must forthwith go with him to the army. It was in vain to resist: the king, after protracting the time as long as he could, stepped into his coach, and was immediately conveyed to the army, which was now on its march to the general rendezvous, at Triplo heath, near Cambridge. The parliament apprized of this event by their commissioners, who had the charge of the king at Holmby, were struck with fear and consternation. Fairfax himself was no less confounded at the king's arrival: that bold exploit performed, by Joyce, had never been imparted to the general; but Cromwell, by whose direction it had been done, and who was now arrived from London, cleared up all doubts and difficulties. The army being thus masters of the king's person, in a little time became masters of the parliament likewise, and managed all things just as they pleased, agreeable to what Cromwell is reported to have said to some of his intimate friends, "that now he had the king in his hands, he had the parliament in his pocket."

On the sixteenth of June the army drew up a charge of treason against eleven members of the house of commons, the chief of the presbyterian party, accusing them with betraying the cause of the parliament, endeavouring to break and destroy the army, &c. these were Denzil Holles, esq. sir Philip Stapleton, sir William Lewis, sir John Colthorpe, sir William Waller, sir John Maynard, major general Massey, Mr. recorder Glyn, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. This round dealing of the army with the parliament, frightened the city of London so much, that, in great hurry, they sent a deputation of the aldermen and common-council to St. Alban's, into the neighbourhood of which the mutineers were now advanced, to disclaim any intention to raise forces or oppose the army. The parliament had settled the militia of London, according to the desire of the citizens, in the hands of the presbyterians, but being now over-awed by the army, they revoked their ordinance, and settled it as was before; upon this the common-council petitioned to have it settled their own way, and at the same time (July 26) a great multitude of the city apprentices, stirred up, no doubt, by the leading presbyterians in the city, came in a tumultuous manner to the parliament-house, and compelled them by threats and violence to do it, and also to vote that the king should come to London. The crafty Cromwell enjoyed this storm, which he saw would soon sweep before it the obstacles to his ambition: and indeed the transactions of the parliament at this time were so inconsistent, so tumultuous, and so contradictory, that they deserve no mention in history: to-day the independents mob, to-morrow that of the presbyterians prevailed. The parliament had no longer with it those able men who could direct the tumult, for the tumult now directed the parliament, which really had no will of its own. The commons, on the twenty-seventh of July adjourned to the thirtieth; and in the mean while not only Lenthall, speaker to the house of commons, but the earl of Manchester, who was speaker to the house of peers, with a great number of the members of both houses, fled with their regalia to the army, which, upon their arrival, and the news of the Westminster tumults, immediately directed its march towards London, in order, as they gave out, to restore the violated privileges of parliament.

Lenthall

Lenthall and Manchester were both presbyterians, and such a step in them was altogether unaccountable; but they probably thought that the army must in the end prevail, and they were willing to secure the interest of that party which was likely to have the ascendant.

The parliament, driven from their temporizing maxims, and obliged, either to abandon at once, or support by force, their power and liberty, prepared themselves for a vigorous defence, and resolved to oppose the violence of the army. On the thirtieth of July both houses met, and immediately elected new speakers, lord Hunsdon, and Henry Pelham; they repeated their former orders for levying troops: they constituted Massey commander: they ordered the trained-bands to guard the lines; and nothing was to be heard through the whole city but the sound of military preparations. It soon appeared, however, that all their resources were unequal to the present occasion. As the army advanced, Rainsborow, being sent over the river with a party of horse, presented himself before Southwark, and was readily admitted by some soldiers who were posted there for its defence, and who were determined not to divide their interests from those of the army. It was in vain to attempt resistance. The army marched through the city in triumph on the sixth of August; but observed the greatest order and regularity. They conducted to Westminster the two speakers, who took their seats without opposition. The eleven secluded members, being charged as the authors of the tumult, were expelled the house; and most of them abandoned the kingdom: seven peers were accused of high treason: the mayor, one sheriff, and three aldermen, committed to the Tower: several citizens and officers of the militia confined in other prisons: every decree of the parliament reversed from the time of the tumult till the return of the speakers: the lines about the city levelled: the independents re-established in the command of the militia: regiments stationed in Whitehall and the Meuse: and, in a word, the parliament reduced to a state of the most abject and deplorable slavery.

As to the king, he was obliged to attend the motions of the army since his late seizure, till, upon their approach to London, he was conducted to Hampton-court, where he was treated with great respect and civility by the heads of the army, and had all due honours paid him; though, in reality, he was no better than their prisoner. The parliament, or rather the army, who directed all their votes, put the command of the Tower into Fairfax's hands, declaring him at the same time generalissimo, with a power to put in or displace such officers as he pleased: but they were still at a loss how to dispose of the king's person. The independents had him in their power at Hampton-court. Cromwell and the presbyterian party both entered into treaty with him; the Scots likewise, by the earls of Lauderdale, Loudon, and Lanerk, their commissioners, proposed to carrying him off. Charles, who equally dreaded all those parties, was under a dreadful perturbation of spirit: at last perceiving that he had been the dupe of Cromwell, and being secretly apprized that the latter was forming dangerous designs against his life, resolved to withdraw himself from the army, and, accompanied only by sir John Berkeley, Ashburnham, and Legg, he privately left Hampton-court, in the night-time, on the thirteenth of November, and his escape was not discovered till near two hours after his departure, when those who entered his chamber found on the table some letters addressed to the general and the officers who had attended him.

The parliament was struck with the news of Charles's escape, and made it high-treason and death without mercy for any one to conceal him. But on the fifteenth they were eased of their fears by a letter from Hammond, governor of the Isle of Wight, acquainting them that the king was then at Cowes. This Hammond had espoused a daughter of the famous Hampden, and was entirely devoted to the interest of Cromwell; but as he was at the same time a nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, and was generally reputed a man of honour and integrity, it had been judged proper by Charles and the companions of his flight, to apply to him in the present necessity, when no other expedient could be devised. Accordingly Charles went over to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under Hammond's protection, hoping there to find an asylum, instead of which he only met with a new prison.

Some historians have imagined that the king's retreat to the Isle of Wight was entirely voluntary; others think his going thither was the effect of Cromwell's artifice, who tried to urge him to this measure by groundless alarms, purposely conveyed to him, as if the agitators had sworn to take his life. Be this as it will, certain it is Charles was never guilty of a weaker step, nor one more agreeable to Cromwell and his enemies. He was now, by orders of the parliament, confined in Carisbrook castle, with orders that none of his friends or adherents should be admitted to his presence, or to remain on the island. He was now in a place removed from his friends, at the disposal of the army, whence it would be almost impossible to deliver him, either by force or stratagem. Charles, however, in this melancholy situation, was not without an appearance of a resource: he held a secret correspondence with the lord Inchiquin, who commanded for the parliament in Ireland; he had private assurance of a strong support from abroad; he was even at this time, by his agents, tampering with the chief officers of the navy; he was carrying on intrigues with the presbyterians in the city; by Cromwell's connivance he held intelligence with officers about his (Cromwell's) own person; and he had now concluded a treaty with the Scots, in all respects disadvantageous and dishonourable; and therefore, by the vicious logic of the Scottish commissioners, who persuaded him to sign it, not to be observed farther than as it served the present turn. By this treaty he approved of their solemn league and covenant, and confirmed all they had done against episcopacy in Scotland; and made some other concessions, which in his soul he abhorred; in consideration of which the Scots engaged themselves to pour a new army into England, and the king was to protect all his subjects of his three kingdoms who should join him.

During the anarchy which now prevailed, the fatal consequence of a divided capital, an insolent army, and the flight and imprisonment of their lawful sovereign, the same spirit which had so long animated the independents, on a sudden took possession of several of the common soldiers of the army, who formed themselves into a body under the

the name of Levellers, an appellation which signified their design of reducing every thing to an equality, and acknowledging no superior in church, army, or state. They did no more indeed than what the commons had done before them; they copied the examples of their officers, and their pretensions seem to be full as well founded as those of the others. Their numbers were considerable: Cromwell, finding that they were likely to become very dangerous, as they acted upon his own principles, and that, if they were suffered to go on, they might deprive him of the fruit of all his policy and labour, formed the sudden resolution to quell them at the hazard of his own life. He repaired to a meeting of those levellers, with a guard of chosen men, with whom he had always been victorious, and began to expostulate with the mutineers, in a canting speech, about the reason of their violent proceedings. Receiving an insolent answer from one of the most licentious, he knocked down two or three of them with his own hand, and falling on the rest with incredible fury, he dispersed the whole body, caused some of them to be hanged by sentence of a court-martial, and sent a considerable number prisoners to London. By acting with the same vigour and intrepidity on several other occasions, he subdued the mutinous spirit of this dangerous sect, and reduced the army to submission.

While these things were in agitation, Charles, in order if possible, to satisfy the wishes of his people, had promised, by a message sent from Carisbroke castle, to relinquish, during his own life, the power of the militia, and the appointment of all the officers of state; on condition that, after his death, these prerogatives should be restored to the crown: but the parliament, directed by the independents and the army, instead of agreeing to these terms, drew up four propositions, which they sent him as preliminaries, and to which they demanded his positive assent before they would engage in any treaty.

By the first of these he was desired to bestow upon the parliament the military power for twenty years, together with an authority to raise whatever money should be found necessary for supporting the forces; and, even after the expiration of the twenty years, they reserved a right of resuming the same authority, whenever the safety of the kingdom should seem to require it. By the second, he must revoke all the proclamations and declarations which he had issued against the parliament, and acknowledge that assembly to have taken arms for their own just and necessary defence. By the third, he was to repeal all the acts, and cancel all the patents of peerage, which had passed the great-seal, from the time of its being carried to Oxford by the lord-keeper Littleton. By the fourth, he must grant the two houses power to adjourn as they pleased: a demand, in appearance of no great moment; but calculated by the independents with a view of removing the parliament to places where it would be wholly under the direction of the army. The king thought it hard, that he should be obliged to make such concessions, while nothing was stipulated in his favour; and to depend entirely on the generosity of his enemies, for what he should afterwards obtain. He requested, therefore a personal treaty with the parliament, and begged that the terms, on both sides, should be previously settled, before any concessions were demanded.

The refusal of Charles so exasperated the independent party, that many bitter speeches were made against him in the house of commons, particularly by Cromwell and his son-in-law Ireton, the former of whom seemed now to have resolved upon the taking the life of Charles. He durst not, however, impart the depth of his design to any but Ireton, and one or two bosom favourites; but though he concealed it from Fairfax, yet he soon preached and prayed him and the other officers into a spirit that was fit for his purposes. Having thus fixed the army, he knew he should have no difficulty with the parliament, where, upon the king's rejecting the propositions, sir Thomas Wroth had the boldness to move, not only that he should be removed close prisoner to some inland castle, but that articles of impeachment should be drawn up against him, himself deprived of the government, and a new form of government established. This motion was seconded by Ireton and Cromwell, with great warmth, but in general terms; for they only recommended it to the house to settle the kingdom without the king, who had rejected all these propositions, promising the army in such a case would stand by the parliament: "but (says Cromwell, with a stern look, clapping his hand to his sword) teach not the army, through despair to seek their safety by some other means than adhering to you who will not stick to yourselves; and how destructive such a resolution in them will be to you all, I tremble to think, and leave you to judge."

In fine, the house, over-awed by his menaces, resolved, on the third of January, 1648, "that no more addresses should be made to the king, nor messages received from him: and to this the lords some days after agreed; the army now promising, in an address to both houses, to stand by the parliament against the king, on whom Hammond was ordered to have a stricter guard than ever, upon an information that a fleet of Dutch ships had anchored near the Isle of Wight, with a design to rescue him.

The king being reduced to this melancholy condition, by the insolence of the army, began to be deeply pitied by the more moderate part of his subjects, many of whom began to stir for him in several parts of the kingdom, in which they were joined by the presbyterians, from their hatred to the independents. Even the parliament, who were still mostly presbyterians, though they had lost their leaders, had not gone such lengths against the king, if they had not been over-awed by the army. What much encouraged the insurrections in England, was a prospect of a powerful assistance from Scotland; for the Scottish commissioners having entered a strong protestation against forcing upon the king the four propositions already mentioned, and their protest being disregarded, provoked at this and many other indignities to which they were exposed, and touched with compassion for the misfortunes and sufferings of their sovereign, had undertaken to arm Scotland in his favour. In this they succeeded so well that they procured a vote of the Scottish parliament to raise forty thousand men for the rescue of the king's person, and to give the command thereof to the duke of Hamilton, contrary to the sentiments of the kirk commissioners and the the zealous covenanters under the marquis of Argyll; who were apprehensive; that if this scheme should succeed, it would effect the restoration of monarchy without the establishment of presbytery.

While the Scots were preparing for the invasion of England, every part of that kingdom was filled with tumults, insurrections, conspiracies, and discontents. The presbyterians, who, by their credit and interest, had chiefly supported the war, were provoked to find themselves over-reached and over-powered by the fraud and chicanery of the independents. The royalists, incensed at the cruel treatment which the king suffered from the army, were strongly prompted to restore him to liberty, and to regain the advantages, which they had formerly lost. All orders of men were fired with indignation at seeing the civil subjected to the military power, and the king and parliament at once inflamed by a mercenary army. But though the whole nation seemed to unite in their hatred of military usurpation, the views entertained by the several parties were so different, that little concert was observed in these insurrections.

Langhorne, Poyer, and Powel, presbyterian officers, who headed bodies of troops in Wales, were the first who declared themselves, and, early in the beginning of the year 1648, assembled a considerable army in those countries, which were warmly attached to the royal cause: young Hales and Goring, who had been made earl of Norwich, excited commotions in Kent: an insurrection was raised in Essex by lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, and sir George Lisle: the earl of Holland, who, since the beginning of the civil wars, had frequently shifted sides, endeavoured to collect forces in Surry: Morrice had surprized the castle of Pomfret, in Yorkshire.

What seemed of the greatest importance, was the general spirit of discontent that had seized the navy. No less than seventeen ships, lying in the mouth of the river, declared against the army; and setting Rainsborow, their admiral, on shore, sailed over to Holland, and put themselves under the command of the prince of Wales. About the same time the king's second son, the duke of York (afterwards king James II.) who was then about fifteen years old, and was a kind of a state prisoner in St James's palace, escaped more fortunately from his confinement than his father had done from Hampton-court, and retired to Holland, where he joined his brother the prince of Wales. All these events however seemed only as the means to hasten the ruin of the unhappy king.

The genius of Cromwell, or the anger of Heaven upon a nation so bespotted with crimes of the foulest dyes as England now was, prevailed over every human precaution. Cromwell marched in person into Wales; and, after taking Pembroke castle, which stood a siege of four weeks, he put an end to the commotions in that part of the country: Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell, who surrendered prisoners at discretion, were tried by a court-martial, and condemned to draw lots for their lives; the lot falling on Poyer, he was accordingly shot to death. General Fairfax (now a lord by the death of his father) successfully opposed the royal party in Kent, under the earl of Norwich: he defeated him at Maidstone, and drove him with his men into Essex, where those who had taken arms under lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, and sir George Lisle, were forced to shut themselves up in Colchester, where they endured a long siege, and at last were compelled to surrender. Lucas and Lisle were shot to death; Goring (earl of Norwich) and Capel were sent prisoners to Windsor castle. In the course of this summer the earl of Holland, Villiers duke of Buckingham, and his brother Francis, were defeated at Kingston upon Thames, by colonel Livesey: the earl was taken prisoner, the duke fled into France, and the lord Francis was slain.

Cromwell now saw his bloody policy of governing by the sword, succeed beyond expectation: it was not now as formerly, when he had the unarmed authority of parliament, and the timorous citizens of London to deal with, for the nation now on every side was in a blaze, which could be quenched only with streams of blood. Besides Kent, Essex, Wales, and the northern counties, the Cornishmen were up in arms, but were defeated at Penzance by sir Hardresse Waller, who afterwards took possession of Exeter. In like manner the inhabitants of Rutlandshire, Leicestershire, Northamptonshire, and the neighbouring counties, took arms, and were assembled near Stamford. Sir John Owen had renewed the war in Wales, and besieged Caernarvon castle; but was defeated and taken prisoner by colonel Carter. From these circumstances the reader may conclude how expert six or seven years daily experience had made the parliament's army in the trade of murder, since about thirty thousand of their troops could keep upwards of a million in subjection, for the army was now actually at war with all the people of England. Its most determined enemies were those who had been most active against Charles in the beginning and progress of the war, and were therefore considered by the army as apostates, and they were on all occasions hated with greater severity than the royalists themselves.

The invasion from Scotland ended no less fatally than the other attempts made this year in behalf of the royal cause. The Scottish army, under duke Hamilton, amounting to near twenty thousand men, entered England on the thirteenth of July, and were joined by five thousand English, under sir Marmaduke Langdale; and falling upon the parliament's army, under major-general Lambert, near Appleby, in Westmoreland, they forced him to retire into the town, from whence he retreated to Kirby Steven, and afterwards to Bowes leaving some of his forces behind to defend the castle, which was besieged, and taken on the seventh of August, by sir Philip Musgrave. The Scots staid some time at Kendal, and major-general Lambert's army increased daily with additional forces: at length Cromwell, having quietted the commotions in Wales, marched with his forces to join him, and in his way took the town of Pomfret, but the castle still held out for the king, but was reduced by Lambert before the end of the year. Hamilton leaving Kendal, directed his march into Lancashire, with an intent to advance to London: this Cromwell was resolved to prevent at all hazards, and therefore marched to Preston, where Hamilton and Langdale lay with their forces. Here Cromwell ventured to attack them with a body not amounting to half their number; and though the royalists behaved with uncommon bravery, yet, not being properly supported by their confederates, were on the seventeenth of August; entirely routed, and most of them put to the sword. Hamilton and his troops were also shamefully defeated, and chased to Uttoxeter, where the duke himself was taken prisoner by the lord Grey of Groby, and sent in safe custody to Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire: sir Marmaduke Langdale was apprehended in an inn.

During these transactions in England, the prince of Wales, having sent his brother, the duke of York, to the Hague, went on board the fleet at Helvoetsluys, and set sail for England, in order to join and head the Scottish army when it should enter that kingdom. When he arrived at Yarmouth, the inhabitants refused him admittance; then he directed his course to the river Thames, and took several rich vessels belonging to the Londoners, which were afterwards restored. Mean while the earl of Warwick assembled a squadron, with which he sailed in quest of the prince, and anchored his ship so near him in the river, that an engagement was thought unavoidable. The prince of Wales was eager for battle, and accordingly weighed in order to attack the earl; but the wind failing, and afterwards blowing full in his teeth, he could not execute his resolution: Warwick being reinforced with some fresh ships, and the royal fleet being in want of provisions, young Charles was persuaded to return to Helvoetsluys, whether he was followed by the enemy.

Cromwell improving the success he had obtained over the Scottish army, marched directly to Edinburgh; by which vigorous step he broke the measures of the royalists so much, that Berwick and Carlisle, which Hamilton had taken, were restored to the English parliament: and leaving Lambert in Scotland with some troops, he returned with his army to England, where his presence was now much wanted by his party, who by this time had firmly resolved the death of their sovereign.

For at the beginning of these troubles the presbyterian party in the house, in the city, and other places of the kingdom, began to resume their courage. Several petitions were presented for a personal treaty with the king; and when the army was removed from London into different parts of the kingdom to quell the risings of the people, the secluded members, and others who had absented themselves, having returned to their seats, the votes of no more addresses were repealed, and it was resolved by both houses "to enter into a personal treaty with the king; and Newport, in the Isle of Wight, should be the place of treaty; and that his majesty should be there with, honour, freedom, and safety; and five lords and ten commoners were appointed commissioners for managing the negotiation, which was allowed to last for forty days from the day of its commencement*." This last was an artful provision thrown in by the independents in the house, who wanted to spin out matters till the re-approach of the army to the neighbourhood of London, when they knew they could carry every thing they wished. Accordingly, sir Henry Vane, junior, who was one of the commissioners for the commons, so delayed the treaty by starting new difficulties, that it was not began till the fifteenth of September, a month after Cromwell had defeated the Scots, and the army was every where victorious. By the same means the treaty itself was prolonged till Cromwell was returned out of Scotland, and at hand to support Fairfax and the rest of the army, which being now collected together, after its various successes, had its headquarters at Windsor, and none remained to stem the torrent of its bloody rage, but the helpless king and parliament. At Cromwell's instigation the general officers agreed upon that execrable remonstrance, which in effect took off the head of Charles. On the twentieth of November, after some debates had passed between the two houses concerning the persons to be excepted from pardon, colonel Ewers, at the head of seven other officers, presented to the commons this remonstrance. It began with a demand to drop the treaty with the king, and to bring him to justice; to declare the prince of Wales and the duke of York to be incapable of government; that the army be satisfied out of the estates of delinquents; that justice be done to the capital causes of war; that a period be put to that parliament; that the frequent returns of annual or triennial parliaments be secured; that there be a more equal representative of the people in the house of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king should be disabled from electing or being elected; that the supreme power of government should be invested in the representatives of the people, among whom there should be liberty of entering dissents; that all future kings should be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general settlement should be established by the general contract of the people; but that none should have a share in it, who should oppose the matters contained in that remonstrance.

The parliament, though on all hands surrounded with the most imminent danger, and though unable to resist the usurpations of the army, nobly determined to oppose them to the last; and rather involve the nation in anarchy and confusion, than give their authority to those violent and desperate measures which were now projected. They deigned not to return any answer to the remonstrance of the army; but the latter had concerted measures to put it out of the power of the parliament to obstruct their designs: for colonel Hammond received an order, on the twenty-second of November, from Fairfax to attend him, and to resign to colonel Ewers (the same who had presented the army's remonstrance) the custody of the king's person, which was accordingly done, and the helpless king was, on the thirtieth of the same month, carried over to Hurst castle†, where he was again shut up from all his attendants, and continued close prisoner. The presbyterians exerted themselves anew on this occasion against the army, which they perceived to be upon the point of giving law to the parliament. On the fourth of December they voted "that the removal of the king out of the Isle of Wight was without the knowledge and consent of the house." Next day it was voted by a majority of one hundred and twenty-nine against eighty-three, "that the answers of the king to the propositions of both houses (during the treaty at Newport) are a ground for the house to proceed upon, for the settlement of the kingdom."

This vote brought matters to a crisis between the parliament and the army; the officers, conscious of their own strength, resolved no longer to keep measures: employing the name of Fairfax (for he still suffered them to make use of his name) they conducted the army to London on the sixth of December, and posted guards in Whitehall, the Meuse, St. James's, Durham-house, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard. Next day colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, had surrounded the house with two regiments, by whom above forty members, as they were coming to the parliament, were seized, and committed to the custody of the guards in several inns in Westminster and the parts adjoining: and, not satisfied with this, they presented a paper to the house, wherein they accused major-general Brown and ninety members, for inviting the Scots into England the last summer, and therefore required they might be excluded the house. Even this violent outrage was not sufficient to subdue the parliament: they adjourned for four or five days, in which space the army was busied in completing their form of government.

And now the fall of the unhappy king came on apace. Cornwall, who was then returned to his seat in the house of commons, and had been thanked for his services in Scotland, had now no other difficulty in completing the murder of Charles, but to disguise the horror of the deed from Fairfax, who began to fear he had gone too far, nor could all the arts of Cromwell restore him to perfect quiet. The remnant of the house of commons, consisted of a set of men raised from the lowest class of life, the slaves of the army, whose officers exercised unlimited power in all proceedings: the city itself was in subjection to them. Cromwell, who could do what he pleased with the soldiers, got them to present petitions against the king; and the counties of Somerset and Norfolk, with the fleet under the earl of Warwick, sent a declaration in which they joined with the army: the common-council of London, which had so lately declared for the king, now wholly under the direction of the victorious party, concurred in the petition to have him brought to trial. At length this bold refusal of the house of commons presumed to form a resolution which far transcended all former acts of treason and fanaticism: on the twenty-third of December they appointed a committee to draw up a formal accusation or impeachment of his majesty. Colonel Harrison, the son of a butcher, was commanded to conduct the royal victim from Hurst castle to Windsor. On the twenty-eighth of December, the committee having made its report, an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the house of commons by Scot, an independent minister. This was founded on a vote which made it "high treason in a king of England, for the time being, to levy war against the parliament and kingdom of England." This ordinance, with many detestable particulars, was very quickly carried through the commons, and on the second of January, 1649, it was carried up to the house of peers by the lord Grey of Groby.

The house of peers, during the whole course of the civil wars, had possessed little authority or influence; but since the king's fall, it had been wholly insignificant; and most of the members, disgusted at the public proceedings, declined to give their attendance. It happened, however, that day, to be more full than usual, and they were convened to the number of sixteen. Without the least doubt or hesitation, they unanimously rejected the vote of the lower-house, and adjourned themselves for ten days; hoping by this means, to restrain the furious career of the commons.

But the commons were not to be diverted from their purpose by so small an obstacle: they voted to proceed in trying the king, and in all other matters, without the concurrence of the lords; and on the fourth of January they passed the following votes, which will best speak for themselves as to the purpose they were to serve:

"Resolved, &c. That the commons of England in parliament assembled, do declare that the people are, under God, the original of all just power.

"And also declare that the commons of England in parliament assembled, being chosen by, and representing, the people, have the supreme power in this nation.

"And do also declare, that whatever is enacted, or declared for them, by the commons in parliament assembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the consent and concurrence of the king, or house of peers, be not had thereunto."

They also voted, "That all members and others, appointed to act in any ordinance with peers, were empowered and enjoined to sit, act, and execute, notwithstanding the peers joined not therein." And so earnest were both the commons and the army about the king's trial, that the queen, desiring to see her husband before his arraignment, could not obtain a pass for her secure coming and returning.

On the sixth of January, the ordinance for the king's trial was turned into an act of the commons alone, and engrossed: and proclamation was made two days after, in Westminster hall, Cheapside, and the Old Exchange, for witnesses to come in against him; and commissioners were appointed for trying him. At first it was proposed to name some of the house of peers to be commissioners for that purpose; but, upon second thoughts, that intention was laid aside, and Thomas lord Fairfax, general, Oliver Cromwell, esq. lieutenant-general, Henry Ireton, esq. commissary-general, major-general Philip Skippon, sir Hardress Waller, knight, and other persons, to the number of one hundred and forty-five, were appointed commissioners and judges on this surprising trial.

When those commissioners met, they chose serjeant Bradshaw for their president. He was a bold insolent lawyer, and voted into the presidency, not for his abilities, of which he is said not to have been destitute in his profession, but because he was void of all tenderness towards names, persons, or offices, and was dauntless enough to go coolly through the impious work. Dr. Dorislaus, Steele, Ashe, and Cooke, were appointed assistants to the court, for drawing up and managing the evidence: the former of those was a civilian; the other three were common lawyers, and Steele appears to have been a man of parts. The court in which they were to act was christened by the name of the High Court of Justice, and provided with proper officers and decorations, to give it an august appearance. Bradshaw was attended by a guard, had a sword of state, and a mace, embossed with the king's own arms, carried before him; and he behaved with that gravity which became a supreme magistrate.

On the nineteenth of January the king was brought from Windsor to St. James's house, and all things were prepared for his fatal tragedy, in which the commons proceeded with unabated earnestness, notwithstanding the house of lords, and the remonstrance of the parliament of Scotland, now convened, against it.

On Saturday, January 20, 1649, the king was brought before the high court of justice, in Westminster hall, having been guarded thither by colonel Hacker and about thirty officers armed. I shall not detain the reader with the particulars of this execrable trial, which are to be found in every history of those times; they are neither interesting nor instructive: it is sufficient to say that Charles's deportment before his infamous judges was very majestic; he looked undauntedly on the array of troops that attended him, and the pageantry of the court; and, without moving his hat, or shewing the regicides the smallest mark of reverence, he seated himself in a chair of crimson velvet, prepared for him within the bar. It may be thought strange by some readers, that as a great number, if not the majority, of the commissioners who were empowered to act on this occasion, detested the guilt of the court, they did not attend and endeavour to prevent the sentence*: but the truth is, the furiousness of the army was such, that had any difficulty occurred in condemning Charles, it would have purged the court as it had done the parliament.

The substance of the charge against the king was, "that he had endeavoured to set up a tyrannical power, and to that end had raised and maintained a cruel war against the parliament." The king, on the hearing this charge read by the clerk of the court, made no other answer but by denying the authority of the court; the same he did on the twenty-second and twenty-third. At length being brought before them a fourth time, on January 27, he earnestly desired before sentence, to be heard before the lords and commons (intending, as it was thought, to have resigned his crown to his eldest son Charles, prince of Wales), but his request was not granted; and so still persisting in disowning the jurisdiction of the court, and consequently in his refusal to answer the charge, his silence was taken for confession; sentence of death was passed upon him, after an insolent speech made by Bradshaw, all the members present standing up by way of approbation: their names were as follows; Bradshaw, president, Lisle, Say, Cromwell, Ireton, Hardress Waller, Bouchier, Heveningham, Pennington, Martin, Purefoy, Barkstead, Tomlinson, Blackiston, Millington, Constable, Ludlow, Hutchinson, Livesey, Tichburn, Roe, Lilburne, Smith, Edwards, Clement, Wogan, Norton, Harvey, Venn, Scot, Andrews, Fleetwood, Mayne, J. Temple, Scrope, Dean, Okey, Hewson, Goffe, Holland, Carew, Jones, Corbet, Allen, Pelham, Blagrove, Walton, Harrison, Whalley, Pride, Ewers, Grey of Groby, Danvers, Maleverer, More, Alured, Cawley, Stapley, Downs, Horton, Hammond, Love, Potter, Garland, Dixwell, P. Temple, Waite. The sentence ran: "That he, Charles Stuart, king of England, having been convicted and attainted as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy, should be put to death, by severing his head from his body." This sentence, and the warrant for execution, in consequence thereof, were signed and sealed by all the commissioners above mentioned, except such of them whose names are printed in Italic characters. And here it will be necessary to take notice, that colonel Richard Ingoldsby's hand and seal were, against his consent, put to the death-warrant, by Oliver Cromwell; but his early disclaiming the fact, and his active and successful endeavours for the restoration of king Charles II. to his crown and kingdoms, not only obtained his pardon, but also gained him the king's favour, who conferred on him the dignity of a knight of the Bath at his coronation.

* It was a remark, that in calling over the court the first day of the king's trial, when the crier pronounced the name of lord Fairfax, which had been inserted in the number, a voice came from the gallery, crying, "He has more wit than to be here." When the impeachment was read, "in the name of the good people of England; "That is a lye," said the same voice, in a shriller tone, "Not a half, nor a quarter: where are the people or their representatives? Oliver Cromwell is a rogue and a traitor."

Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, gave orders to fire at the place from whence these insolent speeches proceeded, calling out, "Down with the whores; shoot them:" but it was soon found, that the lady Fairfax was there, and that it was she who had the courage to utter them. She was a person of very noble birth, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury; but, being misled by the prejudices of the times, she had long encouraged her husband's zeal against the royal cause, and was now, as well as he, filled with abhorrence at the fatal and unexpected consequences of all his victories and successes. Dear Sir

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst. in relation to the matter of the American Anti-Slavery Society. I am very glad to hear that you are so interested in the cause of the oppressed, and I am sure that your efforts will be successful. I am, Sir, very respectfully, Your obedient servant,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison

Yours truly,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison

By this time Pau, and another ambassador from the States General, had arrived in England, and had presented to the house of commons letters from their masters, demanding a respite of Charles's sentence, which was flatly denied them: in like manner the Scottish commissioners at London gave in very warm remonstrances to the house in favour of the king; but they were laid aside without being read, and the commissioners were voted to go from England to Scotland, to preserve a good intelligence between the two kingdoms.

Fairfax now found himself truly miserable, for contributing so much to the woes he could not prevent; and had even formed a design, which, if it had been executed, would have freed him from the load of disloyalty under which he laboured: this was, to assemble some of the officers most attached to him, and forcibly rescue the king from the hands he was in. Understanding the death-warrant was signed, in order to gain time he repaired to Cromwell, to procure a respite, for some days at least, of the execution; but Cromwell penetrated into his design, and, knowing Fairfax's weak side, seemed to approve of the motion, but requested his excellency to join with him and his brother officers in seeking God for a blessing upon their endeavours. This happened on the morning of the king's execution; and Fairfax was so plied with prayers, that after the king's head was struck off, meeting Herbert in one of the galleries of Whitehall, he asked how his majesty did? and was amazed and confounded when he heard of his being beheaded.

Three days were allowed the king between his sentence and his execution; this interval he chiefly employed in reading and devotion, having obtained leave for Juxon, bishop of London, for whom he had a great regard, to attend him: all his family that remained in England were suffered to visit him: it consisted only of the princess Elizabeth and the duke of Gloucester. Their meeting was extremely tender: Charles cautioned them both against popery, and the young duke against accepting the crown during the lives of his brothers: Charles then gave them a few jewels, which he told them was all that he could bequeath them: and the reader may easily conceive their parting to be the most moving that could happen.

On the thirtieth of January he was conducted on foot through St. James's Park to Whitehall, accompanied by Dr. Juxon, and guarded by a regiment of foot, under the command of colonel Tomlinson. He had taken the sacrament in the morning; and continued in his devotions at Whitehall till noon, where he drank a glass of wine and eat a morsel of bread: then he went through the Banqueting-house to the scaffold, erected adjoining to that edifice. It was covered with black cloth; in the middle of it appeared the block and ax, with two executioners in vizors; several troops of horse and companies of foot were drawn up on each side, and the palace was surrounded by a multitude of spectators. The king eyed the apparatus of death with great composure, and asked if there was not a higher block: then addressing himself to the colonels Tomlinson, Hacker, and some other persons who were on the scaffold, he declared himself innocent of having commenced war against the parliament: he owned that his fate was a just judgment from Heaven, for having consented to the execution of an unjust sentence against the earl of Strafford: he forgave all his enemies, exhorted the people to return to their obedience, and acknowledge his successor as their lawful sovereign; and signified his inviolable attachment to the protestant religion as professed by the church of England. While he prepared himself for the block, Dr. Juxon told him there was but one stage more, which, though troublesome, was short, and would convey him to heaven, where he should find ineffable joy and comfort: "I go (said the king) from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be." "You are exchanged (replied the good bishop) from a temporal to an eternal crown; a good exchange!" Charles, having taken off his cloak, delivered his George to the prelate, pronouncing the word "Remember!" Then he laid his neck upon the block, and stretching out his hands as a signal, one of the men in vizors severed his head from his body at one blow, and the other holding it up, streaming with blood, exclaimed, "This is the head of a traitor!" The spectators testified their sorrows in sighs, tears, and lamentations; and a great number attempted to dip their handkerchiefs in the blood of their murdered prince. The body was put into a coffin covered with black velvet, and removed to an apartment in Whitehall, then embalmed, and exposed for several days at the palace of St. James's: at length the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, and the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, obtained permission to bury it in the church of Windsor, where it was privately interred, without any funeral ceremony.

Thus fell Charles I. king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the murderous decree of his own subjects, and the ignominious hand of a common executioner. There had been several instances formerly of kings of England deposed by act of parliament, and of the wives of kings who had fallen by the stroke of the executioner; Mary, queen of Scots, had been sentenced to death by English commissioners, who had no other right over her life than what a robber has over the defenceless person who falls into his hands: but there had never yet been an instance of any people bringing their own sovereign to the block, with all the pomp and solemnity of justice: we must go back three hundred years before our æra to find an example of the like catastrophe, in the person of Agis, king of Lacedemon.

There have been, through the course of this reign, so many opportunities for the reader to make himself acquainted with the character of Charles, that I shall be as concise as possible in what I have to say on that head. King Charles was certainly possessed of great abilities, and was endowed with many excellent qualifications: he was strictly sober, chaste, temperate, and constant in his devotions, both public and private. Happy had it been for himself and the nation, had he been as good a King as he was a Man! his aiming at more power than the constitution allowed, was the first cause of his misfortunes. The false steps he afterwards committed, the ascendancy the queen and those he trusted had over him, increased the distempers of his reign; and his losing entirely the confidence of his people, with the clashing interest of parties, violent and furious in their opposition to each other, at last completed his ruin, after a troublesome reign of twenty-three years, ten months, and three days.

Matters of religion make up great part of Charles's history: some have impiously charged him with being a friend to popery: and others, from the concessions he made in favour of presbytery, will not allow him to have died in the faith of the church of England. It is to his immortal honour that we can say, that all his tenderness for his queen's person never brought him to harbour the smallest thought of adopting her religion; and we have it from unquestionable authority, that when he was at Oxford, he made the following declaration, as he was going to receive the sacrament from the hands of archbishop Usher: "My lord, I copy here many resolved protestants, who may declare to the world the resolution I do now make. I have, to the utmost of my power, prepared my soul to become a worthy receiver; and may I receive comfort from the blessed sacrament, as I do intend the establishment of the true reformed protestant religion, as it stood in its beauty in the happy days of queen Elizabeth, without any connivance at popery. I bless God, that, in the midst of these public distractions, I have still liberty to communicate; and may this sacrament be my damnation, if my heart do not join with my lips in this protestation.*"

Charles, by his queen Henrietta, daughter of Henry IV. of France, had four sons and five daughters, namely:

1. Charles James, who died in the cradle.
2. Charles, prince of Wales, by whom he was succeeded.
3. James, duke of York.
4. Henry, duke of Gloucester, who died after the Restoration.

1. Mary, who espoused William of Nassau, prince of Orange, by whom she was left a widow.

2. Elizabeth, confined by the regicides in Carisbrook castle, where she died of grief.

3. Ann, and

4. Catherine, who died in their infancy.

5. Henrietta Maria, who was carried in her infancy, by the countess of Dalkeith, into France, where she married Philip, duke of Anjou and Orleans, brother to Lewis XIV †.

The COMMONWEALTH of ENGLAND.

A. D. 1649.

THE parliament, for such we must now call the small inconsiderable part of the house of commons that continued sitting, having murdered their sovereign in the manner already related, proceeded to settle the government of the state. The first step they took after the execution of the king, was to issue a proclamation, forbidding all persons, on pain of incurring the penalty of treason, to acknowledge or declare Charles Stuart, commonly called the prince of Wales, as sovereign of England: they likewise voted that those members of the house of commons who had, on the fifth of December, approved, by a vote, of the late king's concessions for a peace, at the Isle of Wight, should never again be re-admitted; and that even such others who had given their negatives to the said concessions, were ordered not to sit in parliament till they had entered their dissent to them.

The house of peers continued yet sitting, and as the commissions of the judges were determined by the king's death, they sent to the commons for a conference about that, and other matters relating to the safety of the government; but they, without returning an answer, passed a vote the same day (February 5), by which they declared "the kingly office to be unnecessary and burthensome, and that the house of peers was dangerous and useless, and therefore to be laid aside." But that they might not be totally excluded from government, it was declared, "that they might be capable of being elected into the house of commons," of which three of them only afterwards accepted, the earls of Pembroke and Salisbury, and the lord Howard of Escrick; but the rest of the lords in general, burning with indignation at this insult put upon them by this fag-end of the house of commons, published a protestation in the name of all the peers and barons of the realm, in which they protested against all

* Dr. Wellwood says of king Charles, that he had a good taste for learning, and a more than ordinary skill in the liberal arts, especially painting, sculpture, architecture, and medals: he acquired the noblest collection of any prince of his time, and more than all the kings of England before him. He spoke several languages very well, and with a singular good grace. The book which he wrote during the height of his troubles, and which he entitled Icon Basilike, is a collection of the prayers and meditations of the king in the exercise of his private devotions, and reflections. The style of this book is strong, elegant, and perspicuous; and it abounds with such manly sentiments of piety and good sense, as do great honour to the royal author. Charles was not only a man of letters himself, but a judge of literary merit, and a generous patron of learning and ingenious men. He was very liberal to the celebrated Flemish painter sir Peter Paul Rubens, by whose advice he purchased the cartoons of Raphael (which were lately removed from Hampton-court to the Queen's Palace in St. James's Park); together with many excellent pieces of painting from foreign countries. He likewise caressed Vandyke, who was the pupil of Rubens, and even bestowed on him his own kinswoman in marriage. His architect was the famous Inigo Jones, an artist that far surpassed all his contemporaries, and left many monuments of his inimitable genius, that still remain in England. Laws the musician was a particular favourite with Charles, who used to call him the Father of Music. He bestowed particular marks of favour upon the renowned Hervey, who, to the eternal honour of the English nation, discovered the circulation of the blood, by his own sagacity assisted by experiments.

During the peaceable period of this reign, the commerce of England increased considerably to the East Indies, Guinea, Spain, and Turkey. The colony of New England became populous; for great numbers of puritans fled thither in consequence of being severely treated by Laud and his high-church party: the catholics afterwards, to avoid the same kind of persecution from the puritans, resorted to America, and settled the colony of Maryland.

This made little impression on the commons; and, to prevent the assembling of the lords, the army, by their appointment and connivance, set a guard upon the door of that house; and, in further prosecution of their former votes against monarchy, they framed and passed "An act for the exhaeredation of the royal line, and the abolition of monarchy in that kingdom," by which it was decreed, that the nation should be henceforth governed by the representatives of the people, under the form of a commonwealth.

Sir Abraham Reynoldson, then lord-mayor, a person of great integrity and loyalty, refused to publish this act in the city of London, for which he was forthwith discharged from his office, and, with three of the aldermen that had joined him, was committed prisoner to the Tower; and one Andrews being chosen by the common-council mayor in his stead, he, with Pennington and other aldermen, proclaimed this most audacious act in the city. But this subversion of the constitution not being relished by the people in general, the parliament thought fit to give them some satisfaction, by publishing a declaration, in which they endeavoured to shew the reasons of their proceedings; wherein several plausible pretences were exhibited: among others, they made a promise of "deliverance from the bondage introduced by the Norman conquest, and of maintaining the ancient laws (which they extolled for their excellency and equality); adding, that they might well consist with the present government of a republic, upon some easy alterations of form, only leaving the substance entire, and reforming the abuses thereof. They promised likewise the establishment of a firm and safe peace, the advancement of the true protestant religion, and the liberal maintaining of a godly ministry; the settling of treaties and alliances with foreign princes and estates; the encouragement of the manufactories, for the increase and flourishing of trade, and the maintaining of the poor in all places of the land."

About the time of publishing this declaration, to complete the model of their government, they abolished all the ancient forms of sovereignty in the stile and tests of writs, commissions, and other public instruments; and ordered for the future all of them to be issued "in the names of the keepers of the liberties of England, by authority of parliament." They next caused the old great-seal to be broken, and a new one to be made, having on one side a red cross and harp quartered, as the arms of England and Ireland, with this inscription, THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND; and on the other side the representation of the house of commons assembled, with this motto, IN THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM, BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED, MDCXLVIII. And, as another ensign of their dominion, they appointed that all the money which from that time was to be coined, should, instead of the king's impression, bear the cross and harp, with this motto, GOD WITH US. The clauses in the first of Elizabeth, and the third of James I.

which enjoined taking the oaths of supremacy and allegiance to the king and his successors, were now repealed, and a new oath, called "the engagement," was enjoined to be taken by all who were put into places of public trust, "to be true and faithful to the government established, without king or house of peers". The ancient judicial and legislative power of the king and both houses of parliament they assumed to themselves; but the executive part of government they committed to a council of state, consisting of thirty-nine persons*, whose places were to continue for one whole year, and then a new council of state to be chosen; and thus the commonwealth government was fully established.

In the mean while, the parliament of Scotland, who, by their commissioners here, had in vain protested against any violent measures being pursued with regard to the captive king, no sooner heard of his horrid murder, than they, on the third day of February this year, proclaimed his son Charles at the Cross of Edinburgh. They afterwards called home their commissioners in England, who, just at their departure, sent an expostulatory declaration to the house of commons, wherein they put them in mind of all their vows, obligations, and protestations for the maintenance of the king's person and just rights, and upbraided them with their shameful abjurations and infringement of the same, by their late bloody proceedings. This was so ill received by the parliament, that they imprisoned the messenger that presented it, and voted the paper scandalous and seditious, and all such persons traitors who should join with them, or adhere to the subscribers. They likewise secured the persons of the commissioners, till a copy of the paper was sent into Scotland, to see if the parliament and estates there would acknowledge the same; upon which a messenger was sent from the parliament of Scotland, to justify what their commissioners had done, and to complain of their detention as a breach of the law of nations. The English parliament, unwilling to embroil themselves in a war with Scotland, ordered the commissioners to be released, and they returned home; but these proceedings increased on both sides the distrust and jealousy they had of each other.

In March, a new high court of justice was erected, of which Bradshaw was again president, for the new trial of duke Hamilton (as earl of Cambridge in England) the earls of Holland and Norwich, the lord Capel and sir John Owen, who had been principally active during the preceding summer, in the attempts made to free the king out of the hands of his enemies by force of arms. They were all convicted, and sentenced to die; but, upon their petitioning the parliament, their pardon or execution was to be determined by the votes of the house, when duke Hamilton and lord Capel were cast, and sir John Owen saved by a considerable majority. The house being equally divided as to the two earls, the former was cast, and the latter saved, by the single vote of the speaker. Accordingly Hamilton, Holland, and

* These were the chiefs of the army, and others of desperate fortunes, and the most active in the late rebellious transactions, viz. the earls of Denbigh, Musgrave, Pembroke, and Salisbury, the lords Grey, Fairfax, Grey of Groby, Lisle, Rolles, and St. John, Wilde, Bradshaw, Cromwell, Skippon, Pickering, Massam, Hazelrig, Harrington, Vane, jun. Danvers, Armine, Mildmay, Constable, Pennington, Wilson, Whitelocke, Martin, Ludlow, Stapleton, Heveningham, Wallop, Hutchinson, Bond, Popham, Valentine, Walton, Scot, Purefoy, and Jones.

Capel, were beheaded the twenty-ninth of March, on a scaffold before Westminster-hall.

It was now thought fit to abolish the council of agitators, who were at first set up by Cromwell and his association, to oppose the presbyterians in their project of disbanding the army. They had now done their master's work, and had been the chief instruments in all the late transactions; and lest they should take it in their heads to carry matters farther than the present rulers, between whom and the officers of the army there was now a perfect agreement, cared they should, those who had first set them up, judged it expedient to put them down; but this could not be effected without some effusion of blood; for those sons of rapine and misrule having notice of what was intended against them, after having in vain drawn up and presented a remonstrance to the parliament for continuing them as a council, had recourse to arms; and about four thousand met at Burford, under the direction of Thomson, a man formerly condemned for sedition by a court-martial, but pardoned by his colonel. Their resistance was not long-lived; Fairfax and Cromwell attacked them suddenly; four hundred were taken prisoners; some of them put to death, and the rest pardoned; and this mutinous spirit was for the present totally suppressed. Let us now attend the steps of the lawful heir to the crown, deprived of his right, and turned out a wanderer to the wide world.

Charles prince of Wales, now Charles II. by the death of his father, no sooner heard of that tragical event, than he took the title of king, being then eighteen years of age. He at that time resided at the Hague, whither two gentlemen had been sent by the parliament of Scotland, to acquaint him with their proceedings in his behalf, and to invite him into their kingdom; upon which Charles resolved to go to France, that from thence he might more easily pass into some part of his own dominions, to receive their commissioners. With this view he left Holland in the month of April, and came to St. Germain, near Paris, where the queen his mother then was; and all the way as he passed through the cities of the United Provinces and the Spanish Netherlands, he was very splendidly entertained. The duke of Lorraine met him on the frontiers of France, and the king of France came in person to Champagne to receive him, and accompany him to Paris, and from thence to St. Germain, where he staid a few months, together with his brother the duke of York, who came to him out of Holland, where we will leave him for the present, and turn our eyes towards the new government in England.

The parliament, notwithstanding their inconsiderable number, found every thing at home composed into a seeming tranquility, by the terror of their arms. Foreign powers, conjoined in mutual hostilities, had neither leisure nor inclination to interfere in the domestic quarrels of this island. Scotland had, indeed, in open defiance of the new republic, proclaimed the son of the murdered king; but the English having no pretext to intermeddle in the affairs of that kingdom, suffered the Scots for the present to settle their government after their own manner. Ireland being subject to the dominion of England, demanded a more anxious and more immediate care.

When the marquis of Ormond, in obedience to the command of his late majesty, surrendered Dublin and the other fortresses to the parliamentary forces, he came over to England, was admitted to the king's presence at Hampton-court, received a grateful acknowledgment for all his past services, and, during some time, lived in tranquillity near London. But being soon after banished, together with other royalists, to a distance from that city, and seeing the cause of his master actually ruined, he thought proper to withdraw into France, where he joined the queen and the prince of Wales. As soon, however, as he heard of the tragical death of his sovereign, he instantly returned into Ireland; and forming a confederacy of the catholics, as well as of such protestants as adhered to the royal cause, he assembled sixteen thousand men, with which he advanced upon the parliamentary garrisons; and having taken Dundalk, Tredagh, Newry, and other fortresses, he prepared, in the spring of this year, to lay siege to Dublin. In fine, the affairs of the royalists in a short time appeared in so prosperous a condition, that it was thought by every one that the young king would repair in person into Ireland.

In this exigency, the governors of the new commonwealth thought it behoved them to take the most vigorous measures for the preservation of that valuable island; and it was voted to send over a considerable body of forces for its defence. On this occasion there were struggles betwixt the several parties in the government: the presbyterians endeavoured to procure the lieutenancy of Ireland for Waller, the independents for Lambert. After the execution of the king, Cromwell himself began to aspire to a government, where so much glory, he saw, might be gained, and so much interest acquired. In his absence, he took care to have his name mentioned in the council of state; and both friends and enemies united immediately in voting him into that honourable post. The former imagined, that the motion had been made at his own request; the latter wanted to remove him to a distance, and flattered themselves that, during his absence, they should be able to open the eyes of Fairfax, whom he had hitherto blinded by his hypocritical professions.

Oliver being now appointed general for this expedition, and lord-governor (that was the title given him) of that island, both for civil and military affairs, for three years, he lost no time in making all the necessary preparations for his departure, and in the mean time sent over considerable succours to colonel Jones, the parliamentary governor of Dublin; by the help of which that officer made such vigorous and successful sallies, that he not only forced the marquis of Ormond, who had by this time formed the siege of the Irish capital, to abandon his enterprize; but falling upon him in his retreat, put his army to the rout.

This was in the beginning of August, 1649; and a few days after Cromwell set sail from Milford-haven, and arrived safe at Dublin with his whole army, consisting of fifteen thousand men, to the inexpressible joy of the king's enemies in Ireland. Having refreshed his men, he entered immediately on the great work he came about. His first attempt was upon Drogheda, a strong town, and well garrisoned with the flower of Ormond's forces, under under the command of sir Arthur Aiton, which he resolutely took by storm, and put all that he found in arms therein to the sword; an act of terror that much facilitated his future conquests, and after this many places submitted to him without striking a stroke.

In October he took Wexford by storm in the like manner, and with the like effect as he had done Drogheda. In short, Cromwell carried on his conquests with such amazing rapidity, that in about nine months time he almost completed the reduction of the whole island; when, about the middle of May 1650, he was recalled by the parliament, in order to enter upon a new scene of artifice in another place. Leaving therefore his son-in-law Ireton, his deputy, to finish what remained to be done, he embarked for England; and landing at Bristol, proceeded in perfect triumph to London, where he arrived amidst the loud acclamations of the people, and had all imaginable honour and respect paid him by the members of parliament, officers of the army, the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and other persons of distinction in the state.

In the mean time, the young king had removed, in September, from St. Germain's, and came over to the island of Jersey, where his authority was still acknowledged by colonel Clavering, governor of that place: and now finding that Ireland was on the point of being irrecoverably lost, he fixed his thoughts entirely upon Scotland; to which country he had been again and again invited over by the violent covenanters, but still upon their own terms. Though those were excessively disagreeable to Charles, yet he had several conferences with Windram, who was sent about the latter end of this year (1649) from Scotland to Jersey. The substance of the propositions from the Scots to Charles were as follow:

"I. That he would sign the covenant, and pass an act for all persons in Scotland to take it, and to ratify all that had been done there concerning the same. II. That he would pass divers acts of the parliament of Scotland, which were ratified by their two last sessions; as for his approbation of their disclaiming Dr. Hamilton's design for receiving the several acts made by the English for the militia, and for the kings of Scotland to have no negative voice in that parliament. III. That he would withdraw his commissioners to Montrose for raising forces, to be sent from beyond seas into Scotland, and to give present orders for the stopping thereof. IV. That he would put away all papists from about him, and let none be of his council but known protestants. V. That he would appoint some place about Holland to treat with commissioners from the estates of Scotland, who would send eminent lords to him, to treat and conclude there upon all particulars; and from the time he should come into Scotland, they would provide for him what was necessary to make him and his train to reside in a regal manner. VI. That he would give a speedy answer to their desires."

This is the mildest form of the Scottish conditions; for they were afterwards loaded with many odious particulars against the best friends of the royal family in both kingdoms, and with many intolerable indignities to the person of Charles himself. When the propositions came to be debated in Charles's council, it was resolved to put off the acceptance of them for a few months longer, when the king was to give the commissioners from Scotland a final hearing at Breda, a place much more commodious for treating than Jersey was. Charles made use of this respite in encouraging the marquis of Montrose to hasten the preparations in which he was at that time actually engaged, to rescue the king his master from the necessity of submitting to the earl of Argyle and his party of rigid covenanters. Montrose having laid down his arms, in consequence of the late king's orders, had retired to France, after being degraded by the Scottish parliament. Charles, after the tragical death of his father, had sent Montrose a renewal of his commission, as captain-general of Scotland; and ordered him to endeavour to raise a body of forces in Germany, and make a descent in Scotland; chusing rather to come in by force of arms than upon the slavish conditions offered him. Montrose having completed his levies, landed in the north of Scotland, in the beginning of April, 1650, hoping that he should be soon strengthened by the coming in of the people, in consequence of a declaration he had caused to be published, previous to his descent, inviting his countrymen to join him in revenging the late king's murder, and in restoring his present majesty: but herein he was disappointed, and the Scottish government took such effectual measures in opposing him, that before the end of April he was entirely defeated by colonel Strachan, who commanded a body of troops, independent of Lesly. This defeat was owing to the rawness and inexperience of his troops; two hundred of whom were killed, and one thousand two hundred taken prisoners. The whole Scottish army soon after advanced against them under Lesly. As to himself, he seems to have been somewhat defective in point of intelligence, and to have been surprized by Strachan so suddenly, that he had no opportunity of displaying his wonted conduct and courage. He escaped however from the rout of this field; and, if we are to believe the tradition of the Scots themselves, he was betrayed by a gentleman of the country who owed him singular obligations. All I am certain of is, that he was sent up prisoner to Edinburgh, where he was put to death, with such circumstances of cruelty and ignominy, as barbarians would not have offered to a man whose virtues did honour to the human species.

After the death of Montrose, Charles finding himself absolutely without resource, he in a manner gave the Scots a charte blanche, agreed to all their mortifying propositions, quitted Holland (whither he had lately gone from Jersey), and putting himself in the power of those who had so lately hanged his general and faithful friend and protector, he embarked for Scotland in the beginning of June, where he arrived; after a very hazardous voyage, having been once in danger of shipwreck, and more than once, of falling into the hands of Popham, admiral of the parliament fleet, which had been sent out to intercept him in his passage. Before he was permitted to set foot on shore, he was required to sign the covenant, and with this request he thought proper to comply. Duke Hamilton, the earls of Lauderdale, Dunfermlin, and other noblemen attached to the royal cause, were immediately removed from his presence, and were obliged to withdraw to their estates, where they lived without any trust or authority. None of his English friends who had served under his father were suffered to remain in the kingdom, the duke of Buckingham excepted; whose attendance on his person, Charles, by the most earnest intreaties, did with great difficulty obtain.

The parliament of Scotland now entered into deep consultation about forming an army for the service of the king, as they pretended; and an act was published for the rating of every fourth man through the kingdom, capable of bearing arms. Lesly, earl of Leven, was appointed general of the foot, and Holbourn major-general; David Lesly lieutenant-general of the horse, and Montgomery major-general; the supreme command of the whole army being reserved for Charles himself, whom, on the 15th of July, they again solemnly proclaimed king at the Cross of Edinburgh; and it was even intended to have crowned him the following month, but certain obstacles interposed which prevented it. Charles himself, though treated with great respect and deference, was totally debarred from all exercise of regal power, and was allowed to indulge in no kind of amusement; and the spirit of the Scots in religious matters being at that time remarkably gloomy and severe, the young king was forced to submit to many austerities that were extremely disagreeable to his natural temper, and which probably produced, or at least strengthened, that indifference for religion, which, during the remaining part of his life, he always discovered.

The English parliament was no sooner informed of the king's arrival in Scotland, than they immediately began to prepare for a war, which they plainly perceived must now prove inevitable; and they resolved not to suffer one half of the island to be an asylum for a person who pretended to be king of the other likewise. The rulers of the new commonwealth had hitherto supported the change of government with as much prudence and conduct, as they had shewn rage and fury in bringing it about: and it was the astonishment of all Europe, to behold a handful of private men, without any chief to command them, keep the peers of the realm at a silent and inactive distance, strip the bishops of their dignity, restrain the multitude within the bounds of order and obedience, maintain an army of sixteen thousand men in Ireland, and the like number in England, support a formidable fleet, well provided, and punctually pay all demands, without any one member of the house enriching himself at the nation's expence. To provide for so great a charge, they observed the strictest œconomy in the management of the revenues formerly annexed to the crown, and made a sale of the forfeited lands of the bishops and chapters for ten years. In short, the nation paid a tax of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds per month; a tax ten times greater than that of ship-money, which Charles I. had attempted to raise by his own authority, and which was the first cause of the disaster and bloodshed which followed.

This parliament was not under the direction of Cromwell, he being at that time on an Irish expedition; but it was chiefly guided by the independent party, who still bore a great sway. It having been resolved by the house to assemble an army against the Scots, they resolved that Cromwell should be sent with it, next in command under Fairfax: accordingly, he received orders to quit Ireland, which he had almost subdued, and he returned in triumph to London. Fairfax, on having the chief command offered him, refused to accept of it; for though he had suffered the army to make use of his name in murdering their sovereign, and enslaving their fellow-subjects, yet he could not entertain the thoughts of invading the Scots, whom he regarded as zealous presbyterians, and united to England by the sacred bond of the solemn league and covenant. The parliament in vain solicited him to act as their general; he was peremptory in his refusal; and, to put a stop to their importunities, he resigned his command, and retired to end his days in peace. This was no extraordinary resolution, at a period and in a country where every one acted by his own rules. This however proved the æra of Cromwell's greatness, who, on the resignation of Fairfax, was appointed "general and commander in chief of all the armies of the commonwealth;" a post of the utmost importance in a state which stood entirely by arms.

The army being modelled and appointed after Cromwell's own mind, and all the grimace of fasting and praying being over, Cromwell, on the 29th of June, left London, and on the 22d of July entered Scotland, at the head of near twenty thousand men; and in the way he marched, he found the country deserted by its inhabitants, and every thing carried away that might serve to subsist his army; so that he could procure no provisions but what were sent him by shipping from England. It was therefore necessary for him to come to an engagement as soon as possible. The disposition of the Scottish generals were such as might have rendered all Cromwell's experience and valour useless, had it not been for the insolence of their men. The Scots were possessed of Edinburgh castle, and their army under Leven and Lesly, which was more than equal to that of the English, posted so advantageously near that city, that it could not be attacked. Cromwell had all the country between Dunbar and Edinburgh, a space of about eighteen miles; but though he marched and counter-marched his army, and though his men had all advantages in all skirmishes, yet he saw nothing before his eyes but famine, for the stormy weather did not admit his receiving any provisions from his ships. He still endeavoured, by acts of humanity to the Scots who fell into his hands, and of justice upon his own soldiers who were found plundering the country, to make a party among the Scots. But all was in vain; and their preachers already began to triumph from the pulpits, as if the whole English army was upon the point of being destroyed. Matters remained in this situation till the beginning of September, when Cromwell was forced to march from his camp on Pentland-hills, in order, as Whitelock expresses, to fight for his victuals; and, on the first of September, marched to Dunbar, hoping at that place to receive some provisions from his fleet; but Cromwell, to his great joy, perceived that the Scots had left their strong camp between Edinburgh and Leith; and on the first of September, ber, they took possession of another strong camp near Dunbar, from whence he found means to draw them into the level ground.

This was regarded by Cromwell as the omen of a sure victory; and one body of the Scots coming down to support another, the engagement, on the third of September, became general, but the dispute unequal; for the Scots were so far from standing the shock of Cromwell's veterans, that though their forces were become by this time much superior to his, they suffered themselves, almost without resistance, to be cut in pieces: according to the relation made to the house of commons by major White, who was dispatched by Cromwell to London with the news of the victory, the defeat of the Scots was owing to the impatience of their preachers, who had the whole power over the private men, and who drove their generals from their wise conduct, which must have obliged Cromwell either to have laid down his arms, or to have fought under the most ruinous disadvantages. The chief dispute was about a pass between Dunbar and Edinburgh, which the English gained, and thereby opened their way to the Scottish army upon equal terms. Upwards of four thousand of the Scots were killed in the battle, and in their flight towards Edinburgh ten thousand were taken prisoners, one half of whom were desperately wounded, or unfit for service, and the other half sent to London, to be marketed for as common slaves to the English plantations in America: and all their colours, artillery, arms, ammunition, tents and baggage, were taken by Cromwell, with most of their officers of note, whose names deserve no particular mention in history. The Scots immediately, in consternation, quitted Edinburgh and Leith, when Cromwell took possession of them, and then laid siege to Edinburgh castle, which he became master of about the end of December.

The covenanters, humbled by their late defeat, began to relax in their severity to their sovereign: Hamilton, Lauderdale, and all his other friends, were suffered to approach him, and his coronation was performed with great pomp and ceremony at Scone, on the first of January, 1651.

Upon the news of the defeat of the Scots at Dunbar, the king of Spain ordered Cardinas to take upon him the character of his ambassador, and to demand an audience of the parliament; he sent notice at the same time to Charles's ambassadors that they must immediately leave his court and dominions. Affairs between France and the new republic were upon a less amicable footing; the trading friends of the parliament having suffered great hardships in France: cardinal Mazarine, who had then the government of the state during the minority of Lewis XIV. in vain endeavouring to amuse Augier, who was resident in France on the part of the parliament, that minister was called home; reprisals were granted upon the French shipping, and all Europe thought a war between the two nations unavoidable; but they were deceived in their conjectures, such a war being by no means consistent with the plan the parliament had laid down. This year also the court of Portugal, after suffering severely for giving shelter to prince Rupert with his squadron of ships, sent an ambassador to make their concession, who was admitted to audience in the parliament-house, with great state.

Early in the spring of the year 1651, the Scots had assembled another army, under the duke of Hamilton and general Lesly; and encamped at Torwood, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. The king himself was present in the army, and his generals determined to pursue the same prudent and cautious measures, which, so long as they were embraced, had been so successful during the former campaign. With this view they entrenched themselves much in the same manner as before the battle of Dunbar, and were well supplied with provisions from the county of Fife. This made Cromwell, then at Edinburgh, resolve, at all events, to cut off the communication with those parts; and having sent over a good body of troops into Fife, under the generals Lambert and Overton, on the fourth of June, they totally routed a strong party of the king's, which was sent against them. Cromwell, soon after, viz. in the month of July, also passed over with his whole army, and then marching northward, he made himself master of Perth, or St. Johnstoun, and thus posted himself at the king's back.

Charles now found himself under the necessity, if he staid in Scotland, either to fight the English army, or to starve in his camp: reduced to this extremity, he embraced a resolution worthy a prince contending for empire; the way to England being perfectly clear, he determined immediately to advance into that country, where he imagined that all his friends, and all who were dissatisfied with the present government, would repair to his standard. He prevailed on the generals to agree to his proposal, and, with one consent, the army, amounting to the number of fourteen thousand men, quitted their camp, and, on the sixth of August, entered England by Carlisle. The king immediately caused himself to be proclaimed at the head of the army, as he did at all the market-towns he passed through.

Cromwell foresaw and foretold the fate of this march; and his conquests in Scotland were now rapid and important: for, after making himself master of Perth, and several other forts, he saw the whole country, excepting Stirling, quite open before him, and therefore detached Lambert to follow upon the skirts of the king's army, with a considerable party, and leaving colonel George Monk (then an officer under him, and afterwards the famous general Monk) to command in Scotland, he began his march in person with the main body of the army in pursuit of the king.

The parliament exerted themselves to the utmost on this occasion: they not only published an act strictly forbidding the abetting Charles Stuart, or any of his adherents, on pain of high-treason, but ordered the militia of the several counties to be drawn out to obstruct his march; and the lord Fairfax, quitting his retirement, took the field with a considerable body for the same purpose; so that in a few days Charles had as great an army to encounter before him, as that which followed him at his heels; he also found that his friends did not come in to him so fast as he had expected: he had some hopes that Shrewsbury and Gloucester would have declared for him; but in this likewise he was disappointed; and Lambert had made such dispatch, that, on the thirteenth of August, he was within half a day's march; and in two days after he was joined by major-general Harrison with a body body of troops, making in the whole six thousand horse besides three thousand foot, which were posted to defend Warrington bridge, to stop the passage of the royal army; but when Charles came to Warrington, he attacked the troops which had been posted to defend the bridge with so much success, that Lambert was obliged to retire, and the royalists took possession of the town on the seventeenth of August. Though there was no great matter in this advantage, yet it made a great noise in London, and threw all things into confusion. News coming to Charles's army of the distracted condition of that city, it occasioned a debate in council concerning the immediate march of the army thither; but, upon the result, it was resolved to make good all the passes that were thereabouts, for their better security, and to march forthwith to Worcester, of which place the king easily made himself master, by means of the warm side which the inhabitants there had for his cause.

I shall not trouble the reader with all the manifestoes, proclamations, and the like published by Charles after his entering England, nor with the particulars of the many wise precautions made use of by the parliament to defeat his invasion: it is certain that very little regard was paid to any thing that came from the king. General Massey had received a wound, which disabled him from being so useful as he had promised to be to Charles; and Cromwell, after his army had suffered incredible fatigues in its march, was joined by lieutenant-general Fleetwood and colonel Desborough, at Warwick, on the twenty-fourth of August, from whence they made dispositions to invest Worcester, which Charles was fortifying while his army lay near the town. He had by this time been joined by the lord Talbot, eldest son to the earl of Shrewsbury, and the lord Howard; but he still remained in a very desperate condition, being on the first of September, hemmed in on all sides by the parliament's troops.

The earl of Derby, ever since the death of the late king, had lived in the Isle of Man, without acknowledging the authority of the parliament; but hearing of Charles's march into England, he came over, and began to exert himself with great success in Lancashire and Cheshire: he got together about fifteen hundred horse, but, before he could join the king, he was set upon by colonel Lilburne, with a body of parliament forces, and entirely defeated, himself with difficulty escaping to the royal army before Worcester.

On the third of September, being that day twelve-month that the battle of Dunbar was fought, Cromwell charged the king's army so furiously, that, after some hours dispute, they were driven back on both sides the Severn, and retiring into the city in the utmost confusion, were followed by Cromwell's men, who made a dreadful slaughter of the royal troops, and obtained a complete victory. According to the best accounts two thousand royalists were cut in pieces, and upwards of seven thousand taken prisoners on that and the succeeding days. The chief of the prisoners were the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Derby, Cleveland, Lauderdale, Ruthen, Carnwarth, and Kelly, the lord Spynie, sir John Packington, sir Ralph Clare, sir Charles Cunningham, colonel Graves, Fanshaw, secretary to Charles, six colonels of horse, thirteen of foot, nine lieutenants-colonels of foot, six majors of horse, thirteen majors of foot, thirty-seven captains of horse, seventy-two captains of foot, fifty-five quarter-masters, eighty of the king's domestics, with his coach and equipages, and a collar of SS. and standard. The king himself must have been taken, had not the earl of Cleveland, sir James Hamilton, colonel Careless, and a few other gallant officers, prevailed with the foot to keep the enemy a little in play till Charles could have time to escape, which he did, with about sixty horse, by one of the gates of the city in the dusk of the evening. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Shrewsbury, Cleveland, and Derby, with some other English and Scottish noblemen. His escape was chiefly favoured by the greediness of the parliament army, who immediately fell to plundering the town and lodgings of the royalists. We must not forget to observe, that the brave duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded in the engagement, and died a few days after. Cromwell, after the battle, ordered the walls of Worcester to be levelled with the ground. Charles having fled as far as Kidderminster, he was advised, by the earl of Derby, to make the best of his way to a place called Boscobel, in Shropshire, but upon the confines of Staffordshire, inhabited by William Penderel and his wife, trusty persons on whom he might depend. Thither Charles was conveyed, while the lords and others in his train took leave of him, and made the best of their way to join Lesly, who was on his march northwards; but in their route thither the earls of Derby and Lauderdale, with some other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners by the enemy. The earl of Derby was carried to Chester, where being condemned by a council of war, he suffered death at Bolton soon after. Sir Timothy Fetherstonehaugh, with several other loyal persons, underwent the same fate, about the same time. The earl of Lauderdale was sent prisoner to Windsor castle; and the earl of Cleveland, with the lords Wentworth and Kenmure, and the generals Massey and Middleton, having been taken at the same time, were sent to different prisons; but the duke of Buckingham, with the lords Levingston and Talbot, escaped beyond sea. It must not be forgot that the escape of Charles was greatly facilitated by colonel Careless, who kept several of the pursuing parties in play with a small handful of men he picked up upon the road.

The proper agents for secreting Charles being provided, he was instantly disguised in the most homely cloaths their several habitations would afford, and transformed into a woodman; but the enemy had got so good intelligence, that, the day after the battle, some of the parties were at the neighbouring villages in search of him, and actually passed very near the place where he absconded. Three brothers, of the name of Penderel, acted as scouts upon the skirts of the adjoining fields; a fourth brother acted as an instructor of his majesty in his new state; and one or two other persons behaved with equal fidelity. In a few days finding his safety there to be precarious, he made an attempt, with his faithful conductors, to pass into Wales, where he thought he would be more in security, but he found it impracticable, through the vigilance of his enemies: their soldiers lay upon all the roads, and guarded all the passes upon the rivers, rivers, and though all imaginable care was taken to disguise the person and discolour the skin of Charles, yet he was several times in danger of being taken. Being obliged to return to Boscobel, his strength and spirits were quite exhausted; but being joined by colonel Careless, he betook himself next day to a neighbouring wood, where he mounted the oak, which the devotion of his family's friends have since idolized under the name of Royal. This umbrageous tree for some time protected Charles from the pursuit of his enemies, and thus for several days he led a kind of woodland life, not without some diverting adventures too minute for this history, until he was discovered by the lord Wilmot, who had been concealed by Mr. Whitegrave and Mr. Huddelston, both of them papists, the latter a priest. By their advice he changed his lodging to Mr. Whitegrave's house, being guarded thither on horseback by the five brothers Penderel. All this time the parliament officers were very inquisitive about Charles in the neighbourhood of those parts; and perhaps it would have been more difficult to have concealed him, had not the houses where he absconded generally belonged to Roman catholics, and contained many ingenious lurking holes in the walls, wainscoting, and the like, for the benefit of their priests when hard beset by the officers of justice. In the neighbourhood of this place lived colonel Lane, a loyal gentleman, who was well known to the lord Wilmot, and therefore trusted by him with the secret of the king's concealment: after some consultation it was resolved to make use of a pass that Mrs. Jane Lane, the colonel's sister, had obtained for herself and a servant to go to Bristol. Upon this Charles was equipped as a servant-man, and was mounted on the same horse before the lady, another gentleman and his wife being in company, and the lord Wilmot attending them at a distance as a servant, with a hawk on his fist; in this equipage they travelled, not without Charles running many risks of being discovered, till they came to a gentleman's house within three miles of Bristol. From thence he removed to colonel Windham's house, at Trent, and endeavoured to procure a passage from Charmouth to France; but being not only disappointed, but almost discovered, he was obliged to return to Trent; and his dangers every hour multiplying, he went to Heale, near Salisbury, and from thence to Brightelmstone in Suffex, and, on the fifteenth of October, went on board a small bark at Shoreham, which landed him in Normandy, near Havre de Grace.

Cromwell in the mean time returned in triumph to London: he was met a few miles from the city by the speaker of the house in his formalities, accompanied by several of the members, and the lord-mayor and magistrates of London, in their formalities. The first thing they did after his return, was to persuade the parliament to an abuse of the victory their troops had gained, and which was so flattering to the English; for Monk having in a short time completed the reduction of Scotland, the English republic had dispatched sir Henry Vane, St. John, and other commissioners, to settle the government of that kingdom, and an act passed including the Scots in the commonwealth with England; the Scots, who in general were more favourably inclined to the parliament than to the king, not being displeased with this establishment.

During these transactions in England, Ireton, Cromwell's son-in-law, after many successes in Ireland, died at Limerick of the plague, and the command of the army in that kingdom was given to lieutenant-general Ludlow: the administration of civil affairs was trusted to commissioners. Ludlow continued to prosecute the war with equal vigour and good fortune, and every where defeated the dispirited Irish.

Never had England been more powerful than since it had become a commonwealth. The parliament, which was wholly composed of republicans, formed the extraordinary project of joining the seven United Provinces of Holland to England, as it had lately incorporated Scotland. The stadtholder, William II. son-in-law to Charles I. was lately dead, after having attempted to make himself absolute in Holland, as Charles I. had attempted to do in England, and with no better success: he left an infant son behind him, and the English parliament hoped that the Dutch would as easily give up their stadtholder as England had done its king, in which case the united republic of England, Scotland, and Holland, might hold the ballance of Europe: but the friends of the house of Orange opposed this project with all their might, and represented the proposed union as so detrimental to the freedom and commerce of their own nation, that the states not only refused to come into it, but the English ambassadors were very much affronted by the populace. The parliament finding they could not bring the Dutch to their terms, sought all occasions of breaking with that republic; and to this end, in the beginning of the year 1652, they passed an act, forbidding all commodities that were not of the growth and manufacture of the country from whence they came, to be brought to England in any other than English bottoms; which put an end to the commerce between England and Holland.

The states of the United Provinces hereupon sent ambassadors to request the repeal of this act; but the English parliament were so far from answering their desire, that they insisted on satisfaction for several old injuries done by the Dutch to the English, in particular the massacre of Amboyna, in the reign of James I. A war therefore necessarily ensued, in which were fought several of the most terrible and bloody sea-fights that ever had been known, between the Dutch under the famous Van Tromp, and the English under the renowned Blake. It would be neither pleasing nor instructive to the reader, were we to particularize the several circumstances of those scenes of bloodshed and raging animosity, which took up the chief part of the year 1652: let it suffice then to observe, that the Dutch were generally worsted, though the English also suffered great loss.

The expences of this war made the parliament contrive all ways they could to husband their finances; and because they thought the entertainment of the duke of Gloucester (whom, since the murder of the king, they had kept as a kind of state prisoner at St. James's) too great an expence, they resolved to send him abroad: and, about the beginning of February, 1653, they sent him with two servants to Dunkirk, promising to allow him a small pension for his maintenance, if he would not go near his brother nor any of his relations: but as soon as he arrived on the other side of the water, he was received according to his birth and quality; and from Brussels he was attended to the princess of Orange, at Breda, from whence he was conducted to Paris, to the king his brother. His sister, the princess Elizabeth, died a few days before he left England, in the Isle of Wight, where she had been confined ever since the murder of her father.

It is commonly observed, that it is much easier to obtain a conquest than secure it; and in nothing was this more visible than in the present posture of affairs in England, where the new commonwealth, now advanced to the very pinnacle of power and prosperity, began to sink under its own weight, and, by intestine divisions at home, to meet that ruin, which all the strength and power of their enemies abroad, or their confederates, could not effect.

Some of the wisest and most discerning of the house of commons had, for some time, began to dread Cromwell's great influence and power, and had concurred in carrying on the war by sea, that they might have a pretence for increasing the national expence, which might oblige the parliament to disband the army, and thus by degrees overthrow the dangerous power of the general. Cromwell saw into these schemes, as they had penetrated into his, and, without hesitation, resolved to prevent them; and as he never lingered in the execution of his projects, he forthwith proceeded to effectuate his purpose. His influence in the army being altogether unlimited, he knew he might safely depend on their assistance in whatever he should attempt: he accordingly called a council of his officers, in which it was resolved (and carried into execution) to present a petition to the house, demanding the payment of their arrears, and affirming that the public revenues, if rightly and honestly managed, would be sufficient for the regular subsistence of the land army; as well as for all the other necessary expences of government. The parliament ordered the officers to be reprimanded for this insolent address, and forbid to intermeddle in the administration. Then the petitioners produced another remonstrance, importing that the members had not performed their promise of dissolving their assembly, that there might be a regular succession of parliaments; they therefore desired they would put an end to their administration, after having convoked another parliament, and named a council of state to administer affairs in the mean time. This proposal was seconded by all the members who enjoyed employments in the army, as well as by the presbyterians, who had been admitted into the house, in consequence of having sworn to the engagement; but the majority was of a different opinion: they resolved, that it was not a proper time to dissolve the parliament, while the nation had a war and a great many important affairs upon its hands; but that the vacant seats should be filled up by new elections. At the same time they appointed a committee to prepare a bill for an act prohibiting all persons to present such petitions, on pain of being guilty of high treason.

Cromwell finding the parliament thus warm, knew he had no time to lose, therefore on the twentieth of April (1653) while the commons were sitting and debating on those matters, and the disbanding of the army, he went, attended by a detachment of chosen men, to the house, and, having set a guard about the doors and avenues, he entered, followed by a number of officers who were most at his devotion, and having taken his place, and listened for some time attentively to the debates; he whispered to Harrison, that he now thought the parliament ripe for a dissolution. Harrison requested him to think seriously before he undertook so dangerous an action. "You say well," replied Cromwell, and sat still for about a quarter of an hour. When the debates were finished, and the speaker was going to put the question, he suddenly rose up, reviled the parliament in the most opprobrious terms for their tyranny, cruelty, and oppression: then stamping with his foot, which was the signal for the soldiers to enter, he ordered the speaker to leave the chair, telling the house to be gone, that they were no longer a parliament, that the Lord had done with them, and had made choice of other instruments. After this fanatic speech, he reviled several of the members present by name, reproaching one as a drunkard, another as a whore-master, &c. then pointing to the mace, he bade one of his soldiers to take away "that fool's bauble," as he termed it. Major general Harrison then went up to the speaker, who still kept his chair, and pulled him out of it by violence: Cromwell then turning to the members, "it is you (said he) that have forced me to this: I have prayed to the Lord night and day, that he would rather slay me than put me upon this work." Having said this, he turned out all the members one by one, locked the doors of the house himself, and carried away the keys in his pocket.

Thus, by one bold effort of power, Cromwell in a few minutes effected a work, which would have cost a common plodding politician his whole life to have brought about, and in the end he might have been the victim of his own intrigues. What is still more strange, is, that the parliament being thus dissolved by force, and there being no acknowledged legislative authority, every thing did not fall into confusion. Cromwell's genius had foreseen and provided against such a consequence. At first he made some cunning essays to procure an invitation from the chief of the members of parliament to take upon himself the government. But in this he was unsuccessful, and by his own authority he appointed a new council, composed of men whom he thought most likely to advance his design: "Oliver Cromwell, esq. captain-general, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, major-general Lambert, lord-commissioner Lisle, major-general Harrison, colonel Desborough, colonel Hewson, colonel Montagu, colonel Tomlinson, colonel Jones, colonel Sydenham, colonel Lawrence, Anthony Stapely, esq. sir Charles Wolsey, John Carew, esq. Walter Strickland, esq. Mr. Hope, Mr. Norton, Mr. Bennet, Mr. Broughton, Mr. Hollister, Richard Major, esq. Mr. Courtney, Mr. St. Nicholas, Mr. Meyer, and Mr. Williams."

At Cromwell's instigation, this council nominated one hundred and forty-four persons to represent the nation in parliament: these were chiefly taken from the lowest class of people, such as shopkeepers and journeymen handicrafts: one of the most active members of this ridiculous assembly was was a leatherfeller in Fleet-street, called Praise God Barebones*, whence this parliament was called, by way of derision, Barebones Parliament. Cromwell, by his own authority, sent a written order to all these members, requiring them to come and take upon them the sovereign power, and to govern the nation: this order, or writ, is too curious to withhold it from the reader's perusal. It ran in the following terms:

"Forasmuch as, upon the dissolution of the last parliament, it became necessary that the peace, safety, and good government of this commonwealth should be provided for; in order wheretunto divers persons, fearing God, and of approved fidelity and honesty, are by myself, with the advice of my council of officers, nominated, to whom the great charge and trust of so weighty affairs is to be committed, and having good assurance of their love to and courage for God, and interest of his cause, and of the good people of the commonwealth:

"I, Oliver Cromwell, captain-general and commander in chief of all the armies and forces raised, and to be raised, within this commonwealth, do hereby summons and require you,— (being one of the said persons nominated) personally to appear at the council-chamber, commonly called by the name of the Council-chamber in Whitehall, within the city of Westminster, on the fourth day of July next ensuing the date hereof, to take upon you the said trust, unto which you are hereby called, and appointed to serve as a member for the county of—; and hereof you are not to fail.

"Given under my hand and seal the sixth day of June, 1653.

"Oliver Cromwell."

This assembly, after sitting about five months, during which time it became the object of ridicule and contempt to the whole nation, came to a resolution to dissolve itself, and a motion was made and carried, on the second of December, "that the sitting of this parliament any longer, as now constituted, will not be for the good of the commonwealth, and that therefore it was requisite to deliver up unto the lord-general, Oliver Cromwell, the power which they received from him. And that motion being seconded by several of their members, the house rose; and the speaker, with several of the members of the house, departed out of the house to Whitehall, where they, being the greater number of members sitting in parliament, did, by a writing under their hands, resign unto his excellency their said powers; and Mr. Speaker, attended with the members, did present the same accordingly." By this means the politic Cromwell, who had all along managed matters in such a manner as to bring on this issue, was again in possession of the supreme power. Calling a council of his officers, he advised with them how the government should be carried on; when his creature, Lambert, proposed another scheme of government, which was to temper the liberty of a commonwealth by the authority of a single person, who should be distinguished by the name of Protector. This was agreed to, and it was unanimously voted, that the captain-general, Oliver Cromwell, should be chosen into that high office: at the same time a paper, called the Instrument of Government, was produced and read to them, which contained as it were the pacta conventa of the future constitution. This instrument consisted of forty-two articles, which would be too long for insertion here; I shall therefore content myself with giving the heads of the principal articles, which were:

"I. A parliament to be called every three years.

"II. The first to assemble on the third of September, 1654.

"III. No parliament to be dissolved till it hath sat five months.

"IV. Such bills as are offered to the protector by the parliament, if he assent not in twenty days, to be laws without him.

"V. That his council shall not exceed the number of twenty-one, nor less than thirteen.

"VI. That immediately after the death of the present and succeeding protectors, the council shall chuse another before they rise.

"VII. No protector, after the present, shall be general of the army.

"VIII. The protector shall have power to make war and peace.

"IX. That, in the interval of parliaments, the protector and his council may make some laws that shall be binding to the subject."

Cromwell was installed into his high office on the sixteenth of December, by the title of His Highness the Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with prodigious solemnity, in the court of Chancery, attended by the commissioners of the great-seal, the barons of the Exchequer, the judges in their robes, the council of state, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, and all the officers and other persons of distinction of his party in and about London.

The new protector now proceeded to nominate a council, in pursuance of the article for that purpose in the instrument of government already recited; these were, colonel Edward Montague (afterwards earl of Sandwich), colonel John Lambert, Philip lord viscount Lisle, colonel John Desborough (newly made also one of the generals at sea), sir Gilbert Pickering, sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, sir Charles Wolsey, major-general Skippon, Walter Strickland, esq. colonel William Sydenham, colonel Philip Jones, Francis Rous, esq. John Lawrence, and Richard Major, esq.

The first act of these counsellors, after their establishment, was to issue the following proclamation, notifying the new form of government.

“Whereas the late parliament dissolving themselves, resigned their powers and authorities, the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in a lord protector and successive triennial parliaments, now established: and whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this commonwealth, is declared lord-protector of the said nations, and hath accepted thereof; we have therefore thought it necessary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premises, and strictly to charge and command all and every person or persons, of what quality and condition soever in any of the said three nations, to take notice hereof, and to conform and submit themselves to the government so established. And all sheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. are required to publish this proclamation, to the end none may have cause to pretend ignorance in this behalf.”

Thus did a private gentleman, by an amazing conjunction of courage and hypocrisy, rise to the kingly power, though under another name. Cromwell was near fifty-three years of age when he attained the sovereign power, forty-two of which he had passed without having had any employ civil or military. He was hardly known in 1642, when the house of commons, of which he was a member, gave him a commission of horse in the army they levied against the king: from this beginning he rose, by the steps we have seen, to be master of that house; and, after having humbled and subdued Charles I. and his son, he now stepped into the royal seat, and, without being king, reigned more absolutely and fortunately than any king had ever done. As soon as he was invested with the protectorship, he ordered the army to be paid one month's advance; the magazines of all kinds were supplied; in the treasury (of which he had the sole management), there were three hundred thousand pounds, and about half as much in that of Ireland. This year, the Dutch having suffered a severe defeat in a sea-fight, in which admiral Van Tromp, the glory of their nation, was slain, and half their fleet destroyed, they sued to the new protector for peace; and he dictated the conditions, which were, that they should pay him three hundred thousand pounds sterling; that the ships of the States General should pay the compliment to the British flag; and that they should never restore the young prince of Orange to the office of stadtholder. This treaty was finally concluded and signed on the fifth of August, 1654. All the nations of Europe seemed to vie with each other in courting this rising star: the Spanish ambassador was as early as any to congratulate him on his new dignity; as did also the queen of Sweden; the conde or count de Saa, lord-chamberlain of the kingdom of Portugal, arrived in splendid embassy from that court, to sue for his alliance; nor were the French behind-hand in owning his power, having given to monsieur Bourdeaux, their resident here, the dignity of ambassador, to qualify him more highly for entering into a negotiation with the lord-protector, and added to him the baron de Bas.

An accident, which happened about this time, made great noise all over Europe, and shewed the spirit with which Cromwell intended to govern: don Pantaleon de Saa, brother to the Portuguese ambassador above-mentioned, being full of his own exploits as a soldier, and of his high quality, resented an affront which he imagined had been offered him upon the New Exchange, by ordering his servants to his assistance, and, after wounding some English, he shot Mr. Greenaway dead, an English gentleman, who was innocent of the fact. The murder being committed, the Portuguese thought to elude the ordinary officers of justice by retiring to, and barricading themselves within the Portuguese ambassador's house, which they threatened to defend against all attempts to take them; but the fact being notorious, colonel Whaley invested the house with a party of horse. Upon this the ambassador ordered his domestics to their arms, and sent to complain to Cromwell of a breach of the law of nations: Cromwell with great magnanimity answered, that justice must be done, and that blood must be satisfied with blood. All the other foreign ambassadors in and about London, took a very warm concern in the matter, not being able to conceive that a man of quality, an ambassador's brother, and a knight of Malta, as don Pantaleon was, ought to be questioned for the murder of a mechanic, for so they esteemed an English gentleman to be; but all remonstrances to Cromwell were ineffectual, and the ambassador's brother, to the admiration of the world, was tried, condemned, and publicly executed for the murder. Cromwell proceeded so coolly in this affair, that he concluded a treaty with the ambassador almost the very hour that his brother was carrying to execution. By this treaty his Portuguese majesty bound himself to pay a very large sum of money by way of indemnification to England, and gave Cromwell all the satisfaction in other respects he required. Upon the same day (July 10, 1654,) and scaffold, were executed two gentlemen of the names of Gerard and Vowel, for being concerned in a conspiracy for killing Cromwell, surprizing his guard, and altering the new-established form of government.

Cromwell being now at peace with all the protestant powers of Europe, proceeded with great firmness in his government. His fleet and army were more powerful than ever; he never appeared abroad but with an attendance and splendor that equalled or exceeded the majesty of kings; but still the instrument of government, by which he reigned, had not been complied with, and a parliament must necessarily be called in terms of the said instrument: the writs were accordingly issued by the protector, and the parliament met on Sunday the third of September, when the protector went in great state, and opened it with a speech, in which he informed them of the steps he had taken for modelling the new government; assured them of his upright intentions; recapitulated what he had done for the nation; told them he had convoked a free parliament, and that he did not pretend to be their master, but their fellow-labourer. Notwithstanding all the pains he had taken to procure a favourable parliament, he soon found him-

telf disappointed in his endeavours: they chose Lenthall their speaker, at his recommendation; but their first deliberations were employed in examining the nature of that authority by which they were convoked. Cromwell had too many friends in the house to believe this enquiry would be brought to any determination; nevertheless he would not tamely suffer his power to become the subject of dispute, he therefore summoned them to the Painted Chamber, where he talked to them in a style quite different from that which he had used in his first harangue: he said, they assumed too much liberty in questioning the established government, from whence they derived all their authority; for if they were not lawfully assembled, they had no power to deliberate. At their return to the house they found a guard at the door, which would not suffer any member to enter till he had signed a recognition, by which he promised to be faithful to the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and that he would never consent to a change in the government established under a protector and a parliament. A good number, who refused to sign the engagement, were excluded from the house, and many signed it with no other view than that of having opportunities to thwart Cromwell's measures. Several members engaged in a conspiracy, formed chiefly by the cavaliers, to take arms in different parts of the kingdom: Cromwell having received intelligence of the scheme from his spies, anticipated the purpose of his enemies by dissolving the parliament, eleven days before the expiration of the time fixed by the act of government; and he gave them to understand at parting, that he knew several members were engaged in a plot against his administration.

The meeting of a discontented parliament is always a sure sign of a discontented nation: the hasty and abrupt dissolution of such a parliament never fails to inflame the discontent to a higher degree of malignity. The members of this assembly returning to their several counties, carried along with them that spirit of disaffection which they had discovered in the house.

The royalists seeing this general disaffection towards the government, could no longer be held in subjection; they rashly imagined that every one that was displeased, like them must have adopted the same views and interest. This false notion urged them on to practices which, in the end, subjected them and their friends to the severest vengeance.

The cavaliers (for by this name we are henceforth to distinguish the royal party) had designed two insurrections, one in the North, and another in the West. The former, which was to have been headed by Wilmot, earl of Rochester, was wholly laid aside before it was well begun: but the year 1655 was opened by a rising in the West. Sir John Wagstaff, colonel Penruddock, Grove, and Jones, entered Salisbury, with about two hundred horse, at the time of the Lent assizes, seized the judges and the sheriff, and proclaimed the king. But finding the people not in a disposition to join them, they marched farther westward, and being pursued by a troop of horse that lay in the neighbourhood, under colonel Butler, they were defeated on the fifteenth of March, and most of them taken prisoners. Penruddock and Grove were executed at Exeter, and several were tried and hanged both there and at Salisbury; but Wagstaff luckily made his escape. The remainder of the insurrection, which, if properly carried on, might have gone a good way towards restoring the royal authority, was crushed with still greater ease to the government. Cromwell had so exact intelligence, that neither sir Thomas Harris in Shropshire, nor sir Henry Slingsby in Yorkshire, nor the earl of Rochester in the North, nor many thousand noblemen and gentlemen who had engaged to rise, gave the government any farther uneasiness than to be at the trouble of securing their persons, or chasing them beyond sea to their disconsolate king, who remained all this while concealed at Terver, with an intention to embark for England; but returned to Cologne as soon as he understood the confederacy was defeated.

Cromwell, enraged at these attempts of the royalists, determined to humble their mutinous spirit by some severe chastisement. With this view he issued an edict for levying the tenths of all cavaliers, and to inflict other severe taxes upon those concerned. The most obnoxious of the royal party, who escaped death, were transported to the English colonies in America. In order to levy the cruel and oppressive imposition he had laid upon those who remained at home, the tyrant appointed twelve major-generals, among whom he parcelled out the whole kingdom of England: these men, in conjunction with commissioners, were empowered to decimate whoever they pleased, to raise all taxes imposed by the protector and his council, and to seize and imprison any person who should incur their jealousy or suspicion; nor was there any appeal from their decision, but to the protector himself and his council. Vested with such unlimited powers, these major-generals became so many tyrants, and so oppressed the people, that Cromwell thought it necessary first to restrain, and afterwards totally to abolish them; but not till they had answered his ends on the wretched royalists, not one of whom, foolish and forward as they generally were, durst publicly avow his principles.

Cromwell having now reduced the kingdom, if not to a perfect obedience, at least to a total subjection, had leisure to look abroad and attend his concerns in foreign countries. He had for some time been equipping a very formidable fleet, the destination of which was known to no one, not even the commanders themselves; only it was given out that they were going on an expedition that would bring great increase of honour to the nation, and of wealth to those concerned in it. Before we proceed to unravel this secret, it will be necessary to give the reader a cursory view of the situation of the several powers of Europe, at that time connected with England.

The famous war of Germany, occasioned by the Palatine's acceptance of the crown of Bohemia, and which had now raged with great violence for the space of thirty years, was at last terminated by the treaty of Westphalia. In 1648, the young Palatine was restored to part of his dominions; and the rights and privileges of the several members of the Germanic body were thoroughly fixed and ascertained.

Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, who had hitherto supported the protestant interest in Germany, was succeeded on the throne by his daughter

Christina;

Christina; and that princess, tired of the fatigues of royalty, had resigned the crown to her kinsman Charles Gustavus, who trod in the steps of the great Adolphus, and carried his arms to the south side of the Baltic.

In France, cardinal Richelieu, desirous of humbling the house of Austria, had artfully encouraged the troubles against Charles I. of England. His successor Mazarine pursued the same plan of politics too far; for, instead of maintaining the balance between the king and parliament, he suffered Charles to be totally subdued, and a much more formidable power to be erected on his ruins. He sacrificed the interests of Charles II. to his fear of disobliging the new republic, by which he was so little regarded, that their fleet attacked the French navy on their way to the relief of Dunkirk, which was besieged by the Spaniards, and which by that means, fell into the hands of the enemy. The cardinal thought proper to digest this affront: and even sent ambassadors to London to solicit the protector's friendship.

The court of Spain had observed the same conduct with regard to the troubles of England; and had discovered a strong partiality in favour of the parliament. True it is, that, after the death of Charles I. they received lord Cottington and chancellor Hyde, as ambassadors from the young king; but they received them coldly, and disappointed them in the purport of their embassy, which was to procure some supply of money for their indigent prince. Ascham, sent thither as the parliament's envoy, was murdered by some Irish officers at Madrid; and the court of Spain either could not or would not deliver up the author of this outrage; though one of them was actually seized*.

Whether the protector was provoked at this incident, or whether he was cajoled and encouraged by Mazarine, is not now to be determined; what we know for certain is, that he resolved to adhere to the interests of France, and to declare war against the Spanish monarchy. The king of Spain (Philip VI.) had by this time gotten intelligence that the great naval preparations making in England were designed to make an attempt upon his dominions in the West Indies; and therefore, after having dispatched expresses into those parts, to put them upon their guard, he sent the marquis de Leda in a splendid embassy to the protector, to divert or prevent the prosecution of his hostile designs. The marquis arrived at London on the twenty-second of May, 1655, but had so cold a reception, and was so much discouraged in his negotiation, that he quickly returned home.

In the mean while a squadron of English ships, having on board Venables, with five thousand soldiers, set sail for the Spanish West Indies, under the command of admiral Penn, to whom Cromwell delivered his orders sealed up, that he should not know their purport till he had reached a certain latitude: by these he was directed to make a descent upon the island of Hispaniola, and attack the capital, St. Domingo. They arrived there in safety and good health; but, by some misconduct in landing the troops, the design miscarried, and they were repulsed to their ships with great loss. In order to make some amends for this miscarriage, the fleet sailed to Jamaica, which they conquered almost without opposition, and took possession of it in the name of the English republic, on the second of June, 1655. Having left some troops on this island, they returned to England about the beginning of September; and the protector was so exasperated at their having failed in their attempt upon Hispaniola, that he ordered Penn and Venables to be sent to the Tower; from whence, however, they were not long after released. In the mean time care was taken to reinforce the garrison of Jamaica, and that colony soon after became what it still continues, a flourishing and wealthy colony.

The king of Spain was no sooner informed of these hostilities, than he issued orders for confiscating all the effects belonging to the English in his dominions, and the Spanish trade thereby fell into the hands of the Dutch, who were thereby soon indemnified for the losses they had sustained in the war with England. On the twenty-third of October, this year, Oliver published a treaty of peace which he had concluded with France: one principal condition of this treaty was the exclusion of Charles II. and all his relations and adherents, out of the king of France's dominions. Cardinal Mazarine governed in France, during his sovereign's minority, as absolutely as Cromwell now did in England: and having entered into a close connexion with the usurper, he was determined to deny him nothing. Charles II. had actually solicited one of the cardinal's neices in marriage; but the bad condition of the royal fugitive's affairs, which obliged him to take so humiliating a step, was the only cause of his meeting with a refusal; and the cardinal is said to have formed the design of marrying the very niece he had refused to the king of England, to one of Cromwell's sons. Henrietta of France, the mournful relict of Charles I. and mother to his exiled children, saw herself reduced to beg of the cardinal to intercede with Cromwell that she might at least receive her jointure. It was certainly the most extreme and grievous of all humiliations, to be obliged to sue for subsistence to the man who had spilt her husband's blood on a scaffold. Mazarine, after some few remonstrances in the queen's favour to the protector, acquainted her that he had not been able to obtain any thing: she therefore continued in very low circumstances at Paris, with the shame and mortification of having implored Cromwell's pity. As to the young king, he having foreseen what the connexion between France and England would end in, had some time before retired into Germany, and lived at Cologne, with the duke of Gloucester, his younger brother: the duke of York, in consequence of the above-mentioned treaty, now left the French court, and entered into the army commanded by the prince of Condé and don John of Austria, to learn the art of war against France, which had thus infamously abandoned his family.

Cromwell, immediately after his elevation to the protectorship, had sent the gallant admiral Blake, with a fleet, into the Mediterranean, to chastize the corsairs of Barbary, who had committed depredations on the English traders: upon this command he exerted himself in so vigorous and effectual a manner, that those piratical states were obliged to implore the mercy of the English republic, and to submit to every condition which her admiral was pleased to impose, the fame of whose valour was now diffused all over Europe.

Upon the dismissal of Penn from the navy, colonel Montagu (afterwards the famous earl of Sandwich), one of the commissioners of Cromwell's treasury, was appointed to succeed him; and, early in the year 1656, was sent out with a strong squadron to reinforce Blake, and to carry him orders for acting vigorously against the Spaniards. Having joined Blake in the Mediterranean, the two admirals anchored with their fleet, on the twentieth of April, before Cadiz, and it was deliberated in a council of war to attack that port; but it was judged impracticable, for want of a sufficient body of land forces: the admirals therefore divided their fleet into two squadrons; one under captain Stayner, was left to cruise before Cadiz, with a view to intercept the Spanish plate fleet on its return home; the other, under the two admirals, stood for the coast of Portugal, to revictual and refit their ships. On the seventeenth of September, captain Stayner descried the Spanish homeward-bound West India fleet, consisting of eight large ships. Though Stayner had with him but seven frigates, yet he immediately attacked the Spaniards; and, though he could bring but three of his ships to act, he took two of the Spanish ships, sunk and burnt three, and three escaped, according to the account sent by the admirals to the government of England. In the admiral's ship, which they took, they found an immense quantity of silver; and proper care being taken to prevent embezzlements, Montagu returned with the booty and part of the fleet to England, carrying with him the son of the marquis de Badajoz prisoner, his father, a Spanish West India governor, his mother and sister, being burnt to death in the engagement: but himself was nobly treated and sympathized with by Montagu.

While the English nation was thus acquiring glory abroad, at home Cromwell continued to rule with despotic sway: he had deprived Harrison, Overton, Rich, Okey, and others, of their commissions, because they had great influence in the army, and strenuously opposed him from the time of his assuming the office of protector: on the other hand, conscious of his own unpopularity, he endeavoured to engage the affections of the people by an impartial administration of justice. The benches were filled with judges of incorruptible integrity, who gave their decisions without respect of persons; and he laid aside his major-generals, who had now incurred the hatred and resentment of the whole nation. And now thinking that he had established his authority on a firm foundation, and that, in order to make it as lasting as it was extensive, it wanted nothing but the consent of a national assembly; he therefore convoked a parliament: but as he had no great confidence in the good-will of the people, he employed every art to influence the electors, and to fill the house with his own creatures. By those and many other arts and contrivances the protector secured an undisputed majority, and fully imagined he should now be able to accomplish all his ambitious projects.

Among the first acts passed by this obsequious parliament, which sat down on the seventeenth of September this year, was one "for renouncing and disannulling the title of Charles Stuart unto the sovereign dominions of the nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland." This was the first act of that nature which had the least appearance of a parliamentary sanction. An act was also passed "for the securing his highness the lord protector's person, and the continuance of the nation in security and peace." This act was occasioned by the discovery of a plot some time before, that had been entered into by the Fifth Monarchy men, or Anabaptists as some call them; among whom was major-general Harrison, to depose Cromwell; but it was timely discovered by the vigilance of the protector's spies; as was also another conspiracy formed this year against his life by one Miles Sandercome, a leveller. In a word the members of this parliament proceeded in every thing just as Cromwell would have them: they approved of the war with Spain, and granted large sums of money for carrying it on; and, after they had sat some months, a formal motion was made by alderman Pack, one of the city members, for advancing Cromwell to the royal dignity: this proposal occasioned great disorders, and threw the whole house into parties. The chief opposition proceeded from the major-generals, and such officers as were attached to their interest. Lambert, Desborough, and the other officers, made no scruple openly to declare, that if Cromwell accepted the crown, they would instantly resign their commissions, and would no longer have it in their power to serve him: but, notwithstanding all their opposition, the motion was approved by a great majority in the house; and a bill was brought in and passed, on the fourth of April following, for that purpose.

Cromwell was undoubtedly desirous of obtaining the crown; and it was more than probable that the motion for offering him the title of King, was made with his own knowledge, and carried through by the interest of his dependents in the house; but he was extremely disconcerted by the opposition of Lambert and the other officers. He dreaded a mutiny in the army, and indeed a general insurrection throughout the whole kingdom; he therefore declined accepting the regal title, when it was first offered him by a committee of the house, and desired some time to consider of it. Hereupon another committee was appointed to reason with the protector, and overcome any scruples that might prevent him from accepting this offer. The conference lasted for some weeks, all which was apparently done to gain time, in order to bring the army to approve of the design; which Oliver finding he could not do, he, with great shew of humility, on the eighth of May, told the parliament, that he could not undertake the government with the title of King. This plainly implying, that he was willing to hold the reins of government with any other title, the house formally confirmed him in his dignity of Protector, and ascertained his authority by a solemn act, entitled, "the Humble Petition and Advice*." Cromwell having obtained this sanction of his authority, resolved to consecrate his title by a new auguration, which was performed on the twenty-twenty-sixth of June, 1657, in Westminster-hall, with the like pomp and magnificence as at a coronation. Then the parliament adjourned itself to the twentieth of January. After the adjournment the protector stripped Lambert of all his commissions, which he bestowed on his own son-in-law, Fleetwood; but he still indulged Lambert with a pension of two thousand pounds a year, as a bribe for his quiet and peaceable behaviour. Being thus confirmed protector by the authority of his parliament, and having fortified himself by alliances abroad, he began to make it his next care, for the better establishing his interest at home, to advance his nearest friends and relations, and to match his children into the noblest families: his eldest son Richard Cromwell, he called out of the country, where he led a private life, to bring him acquainted with a court, and to initiate him into the knowledge of public affairs. Soon after his arrival he prevailed on the university of Oxford to elect him their chancellor, in which honour he was solemnly installed at Whitehall. His second son Henry Cromwell, he made lord-lieutenant of Ireland: his two younger daughters, Mary and Frances, he matched to the lord Falconbridge, and Mr. Robert Rich, grand-son to the then earl of Warwick; the nuptials of both being kept with great pomp and splendor, at Whitehall and Hampton-court.

According to the conditions of the late treaty between England and France, by which each power was to assist the other, if attacked by an enemy, the French court sent this year to demand auxiliary forces from England, to assist it in its war with the Spaniards in Flanders; which request was readily granted by the protector, and six thousand foot forthwith ordered to be sent over under the command of sir John Reynolds, an officer remarkable for his courage and other military accomplishments, who had been some time commissary-general of Ireland, under Ireton. The arrival of these forces enabled the French to make themselves masters of two very important places in the Spanish Netherlands, Montmedi and St. Venant: and soon after of the strong fort of Mardyke, which afforded them an easy passage to the conquest of Dunkirk, which followed not long after. The fort was by the French delivered into the hands of major-general Morgan and the English, who fortified it in such a manner, that the Spaniards, sensible how much it imported to the preservation of Dunkirk to recover this fort, made an attempt, with a very numerous body of forces, to take it by storm, but were beaten off with great loss.

King Charles having resided at Cologne ever since he left France, now entered into a treaty with the court of Spain, by which he was allowed to reside privately at Brussels, with a pension of six thousand livres a month, and half as much for his brother, the duke of Gloucester, who, after his father's death, had been sent to Holland by order of the parliament; besides, the court of Spain engaged to furnish Charles with six thousand men as soon as he should be possessed of a good port in England. This treaty being ratified, the king quitted Cologne, and repaired to the Low Countries, at the same time that Leopold resigned that government to don John of Austria, natural son to Philip IV. Lord Muskerry, who commanded an Irish regiment in France, abandoned that service at his majesty's desire, and joined the Spanish army; and four other regiments, consisting of English, Scots, and Irish, followed their example. About this time there was a plot laid for an insurrection in England, in favour of the king, and the marquis of Ormond came over to London to favour the design; but Cromwell, having notice of it by his spies, published a proclamation for apprehending the conspirators before they could form a body: the marquis narrowly escaped, but Dr. Hewit, sir Henry Slingsby, Mr. Mordaunt, and several others were seized; and the two former being tried by an high court of justice, were condemned and executed.

During the whole of this year the Spaniards were greatly distressed by the remarkable good fortune of the English arms, especially at sea: for in the spring of this year, the gallant Blake, who had been for a long time cruising in the Mediterranean, to intercept the Spanish plate-fleet, having received advice that it had got safe into the bay of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, he sailed thither with his fleet, resolved to give a good account of them. On the twentieth of April he had an opportunity of observing the situation of the enemy, whom he found disposed in a very formidable posture: the bay was defended by a strong castle, well furnished with cannon, besides seven forts in several parts of it, all united by a line of communication, and supplied with a good number of musqueteers. Don Diego Diagues, the Spanish admiral, had moored his smaller vessels close to the shore, and the larger galleons farther off, with their broadsides to the sea. Blake was rather animated than discouraged by this warlike appearance. Favoured by a brisk gale, which blew full into the bay, he instantly rushed in among the thickest of the enemy. After an obstinate struggle of four hours, the Spaniards yielded to the English valour, and quitted their ships, which were set on fire, and consumed with all their treasure. The greatest danger still remained to the English. They were exposed to the fire of the castle and forts, which must, in a short time, have done them considerable damage: but the wind shifting, so as to blow from the shore, enabled them to weather the bay; where they left the Spaniards equally confounded at their own loss, and the happy temerity of their undaunted victors.

This was the last and greatest action of the illustrious Blake, for he died on ship-board on his return home: the protector, to shew his esteem for his memory, gave him a pompous interment in Henry VII's chapel, at Westminster.

We cannot close the history of this year without taking notice of the memorable trial of one James Naylor, the great champion and ringleader of one hundred thousand pounds a year, a million a year for the fleet and army, and three hundred thousand pounds for the civil government; besides what sums should be occasionally raised by the parliament: and he was allowed to appoint another house, the members of which should enjoy their seats during life, and exercise some functions of the former house of peers. But he relinquished the authority, which he had formerly claimed, of enacting laws with the consent of the council; and he engaged, that no member of either house should be excluded without the consent of that house, to which they belonged. In other respects the Humble Petition was the same with the Instrument of Government.

of the sect called Quakers*, who, having spread his doctrine, and gained many profelytes to it, in divers parts of the nation, was more especially taken notice of at Bristol, and was from thence brought up to London, attended by several men and women of his opinion, who all the way they came (the women especially) are said to have sung hosannahs to him, and to have used the same expressions towards him as anciently the people of the Jews did to our Saviour, when he rode triumphant into Jerusalem. The parliament took it upon them to judge him themselves, before whom being convened, he was accused of blasphemy, for assuming to himself divine honours, and such attributes as were due to Christ only; and tho' he used many cunning sophisms and evasions to clear himself, such as argued him not altogether ignorant of human letters, he was nevertheless sentenced by the house to be first publicly whipped, pilloried, and stigmatized as a blasphemer; then to be re-conveyed to Bristol, there to be also whipped; lastly, to be brought back to London, to remain in Bridewell during pleasure; which sentence was punctually inflicted on him.

The parliament met again according to the adjournment on the twentieth of January, 1658. This session, which differed from the other as much as one distinct parliament could possibly have done from another, gave more disturbance to Cromwell's ambition and safety, than he, with all his policy and foresight, was aware of.

In the first place, the admission of those members who had been excluded the house of commons the last session, and who now returned to their seats in consequence of the following article in the Humble Petition, "that the persons who are legally chosen, by a free election of the people, to serve in parliament, may not be excluded from doing their duties, but by the consent of the house whereof they are members." Cromwell would gladly have eluded this article if he could; but there was no possibility for him to do it without coming to extremities with the nation. The next thing which proved prejudicial to his high towering views of arbitrary power, was the erecting of a new assembly, intended, in imitation of the monarchical constitution, to answer to the house of peers; but it was not thought proper to give it that name; but to distinguish it only by the title of the Other House: it consisted partly of such whom the protector principally relied upon, in the army and other departments, many of whom were picked out of the house of commons, to be called (by his writ of summons) to the Other House; partly of the late excluded commonwealthmen, and such also of the army whom he thought hereby to win over to his party; and about half a score of the old nobility were nominated, but refused to attend. Now in this contrivance, whatever his expectations might be, Cromwell found himself wretchedly disappointed, since by the coming in of great numbers of the lately excluded members, and the translation of several of his warmest friends among the commons into the Other House, his interest was greatly weakened; and sir Arthur Haselrig, and the rest of the staunch republicans, disdaining to accept of Cromwell's offered baronage, took their places among the commons, in order by their presence to strengthen their own party, by which means the republican faction grew so powerful, that an undisputed majority appeared against the protector, and the commons refused to acknowledge the authority of his Other House, which had been summoned: even the legality of the Humble Petition and Advice was questioned, as being enacted by a parliament which was deprived of its liberty by a great number of its members having been excluded by military force, for not agreeing to take the oath of recognition.

Cromwell, apprehensive of some secret combination between the parliament and the malecontents of the army, determined once more to try a strain of authority, and therefore acquainted the commons, that he expected they should pay the same regard to the Other House, and give it the same appellation as had been given to any former house of peers in England. But the commons, instigated by Lambert and Haselrig within doors, and Harrison and the fifth-monarchy-men without, paid no regard to his threats or his authority, but again resumed their strictures upon the late Humble Petition and Advice. Hereupon Cromwell determined to allow them no leisure for carrying their schemes into execution, and therefore, without consulting any one, on the fourth of February flung himself into a mean coach, and going to the house sent for the commons into the Painted Chamber, where, after reproaching them with their factious spirit, and charging them with being privy to conspiracies against his authority, and in favour of "the king of Scots (as he affected to call Charles); since such (said he) is your purpose, and such are your proceedings, I think it high time to put an end to your sitting: I therefore declare this parliament dissolved: and God be judge between me and you." "Amen," replied the members, with no less vehemence than the protector. Thus was Cromwell driven from one inconvenience to another; from the inconvenience of a parliament that crossed him, to the inconvenience of no parliament at all, whereby he found himself equally straitened for want of those supplies of money which he expected. Soon after the dissolution of the parliament, he cashiered several officers of the army whom he thought not sufficiently devoted to his purpose. Reynolds, the protector's

* Among the various sects produced in the last twelve years of civil discord and anarchy, one of the most remarkable was that of the quakers, which was founded by George Fox, son of a weaver, at Drayton, in Lancashire. This enthusiast was bound apprentice to a shoe-maker; but having a turn to spiritual contemplations, he quitted his mechanical profession, and strolled about the country in a leathern doublet, that he might not be interrupted in his sublime meditations. He wandered in woods, lodged in hollow trees, and read the Bible without ceasing: at length he believed himself inspired, and began to disregard the scripture as a dead letter. He now assumed the character of an apostle, returned to the world, and exerted his talents in making profelytes. The fanatics of these times assisted his endeavours with extraordinary success. He and his disciples were seized with such violent transports of enthusiasm as threw them into contortions and universal trepidation, from whence they acquired the name of Quakers. Their peculiarities in manners and doctrine are too well known to need any description. They were severely persecuted, confined in prisons and mad-houses, reviled, scourged, and set in the pillory; but they suffered with such patience and equanimity, as excited the admiration of mankind. They renounced all rites and ceremonies of religion, and pretended to be directed by the illumination of the Spirit. One of this sect perished by attempting to fast forty days as Christ fasted in the wilderness. A female quaker appeared naked in the church before Cromwell, the protector, saying she was moved by the Spirit to appear as a sign to the people. A good number believing that the renovation of all things had commenced, threw away their cloaths as superfluities.

ambassador and general in France, being unfortunately drowned in the spring of this year, in his passage to England, was succeeded in command by Lockhart, a native of Scotland, who resided as ambassador at Paris*.

The king about this time received a petition signed by several independents, quakers, and anabaptists, professing their detestation of Cromwell, and offering to risque their lives and fortunes in his majesty's service, provided he would assent to some propositions joined to the address. In these they demanded that he should restore the long parliament, confirm the concessions which his father had made in the treaty of Newport, and allow every man to worship God in his own way. Charles, who did not relish their demands, and had no great opinion of their interest, returned a general answer, importing he was not of a humour to persecute any person on account of his religion; and that those who were disposed to serve him effectually, might always depend upon his favour.

On the third of June, this year, marshal Turenne, who commanded the French army, undertook the siege of Dunkirk, which was but indifferently provided for defence. Don John of Austria, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, drew together all his troops, and amongst the rest the British and Irish under the duke of York, to relieve it. The English under Lockhart were full six thousand at the siege, and lay with a brigade of French horse on the Mardyke side, as marshal Turenne did on the Nieuport side, a communication being kept up between the two bodies. After the siege had continued about twelve days, intelligence came that don John and the Spanish generals were at hand to relieve it: upon which it was resolved to fight the enemy, and to unite both armies upon the Nieuport side. In the mean while the marquis de Leyda, who commanded in the place, made two desperate sallies, one upon the French and another upon the English quarter, but was repulsed in both; and Turenne acknowledged that the English performed wonders on this occasion. The junction of the two armies being formed, though Lockhart was very ill of the stone, yet he appeared at the head of the English, who, with the French horse, formed the left of the army. The Spaniards likewise were in two bodies; their left wing was commanded by the prince of Condé, and their right by don John, the duke of York, and the marquis of Caracene: each army consisted of about eighteen thousand, but the dispute lay between the English under Lockhart, and the old Spanish infantry under don John. Lockhart drew up the men, and formed the attack with the English upon the flank of the Spaniards, whom he defeated after a very desperate engagement, in which only two officers of his own regiment escaped being killed or wounded: it is certain that the glory of the day was chiefly owing to the English, who, not content with routing the right wing of the Spaniards, fell upon their left wing, which had put Turenne into some disorder. About two thousand of the Spaniards were killed and taken prisoners, with the loss of about two hundred of the English under Lockhart, besides great numbers who were wounded. The dukes of York and Gloucester were present in this battle, and shewed great personal courage, but the English in the Spanish army were far from behaving so well as those in the French. The defeat of the Spaniards put an end to their hopes of saving Dunkirk. The marquis de Leyda, finding his condition desperate, made a sally with all the forces he could collect, but was repulsed with loss, and received a wound, of which he died in a few days after. On the twenty-fifth of June Dunkirk surrendered, and immediately, according to treaty, was given up to Lockhart, who took possession of it in the name of the lord-protector of England. Cromwell placed a strong garrison in this important fortress, and made Lockhart governor of it.

While the dispositions were making for the siege of Dunkirk, the French monarch, Lewis XIV. endeavoured to cultivate the friendship of the protector by every mark of esteem and regard. Lord Falconbridge, Cromwell's son-in-law, was sent over to Lewis, then in the camp before Dunkirk; and was received with the same respect which is usually shown by the French court to foreign princes.

Mazarine dispatched to London his nephew Mancini, along with the duke of Crequi; and expressed his sorrow, that, on account of the multiplicity of public affairs, he could not enjoy the pleasure which he had so long desired, of paying his compliments, in person, to the greatest man in the world. It appears, however, from good authority, that these were not the real sentiments of the cardinal, who used to say of Cromwell, that he was no better than a fortunate madman†.

But all the homage paid to his person and authority, and all the successes which attended his army, were not able to preserve him from the poignant cares which now preyed upon his mind. Oppressed with the burden of public affairs, perpetually apprehending some fatal accident in his precarious government, and under continual dread of being assassinated by the hands of fanatical or interested persons, he felt such a perturbation of spirit as left him not a moment's ease. He wore defensive armour under his cloaths, always kept a loaded pistol in his pocket, and never lay twice in one room. It is said that the death of his favourite daughter, Mrs Claypole, with that of Mr. Rich, his son-in-law, and his old friend the earl of Warwick, shortened the days of the tyrant: be this as it may, we know that about the middle of August this year, he was seized with the gout, which confined him for some days, and shifted from his foot into his body; and about the twenty-fourth of August it appeared he had a tertian ague, upon which, by the advice of the physicians, he removed from Hampton-court to Whitehall. It is incredible into what phrenzies of praying, fasting, revelation, and the like, the preachers and retainers about Cromwell's person fell during his illness: his own imagination, indeed, seems to have been so transported with enthusiastic ravings, that, insensible of his danger, he affirmed "that God had reserved him to greater attempts than ever he had yet undertaken, and that he was assured he should not die of this sickness." Goodwin, one of his favourite chaplains, had the following expression in one of his prayers, "Lord, we beg not for his recovery, for that thou hast already granted and assured us of, but for his speedy recovery." Nay even Thurloe, his secretary, has the following expression in his dispatch to Henry Cromwell, then in Ireland, "that which is some ground of hope, is, that the Lord, as on some former occasions, hath given to himself (Oliver) a particular assurance that he shall yet live to carry on the work he hath put into his hands." After this frantic stuff coming from the pen of so great a man as Thurloe, we cannot wonder at any thing done or said by the preachers and divines of Cromwell's court; as to himself, I am inclinable to think, with other writers, that in this affair he only acted the hypocrite, as he must know that he hazarded nothing by his prediction of his recovery; for if he did not survive, the rumour of his recovery, which began now to be diffused through the whole kingdom, would keep the minds of men in suspense, and prevent his enemies from coming to any certain resolutions; on the other hand, if he should recover, it would add new credit to his government, and the bulk of the people would actually have believed him to be a prophet.

On the thirty-first of August all the symptoms began to wear a mortal aspect, and the physicians declared he could not withstand the next fit with which he was threatened: the council was no sooner informed of this circumstance, than they immediately sent a deputation to know his will with regard to his successor. He was now become delirious, and altogether incapable of expressing his intention: they asked him if he did not mean that his eldest son Richard should succeed him in the government? A simple affirmative was all he was able to utter. Soon after, viz. on the third of September, he expired, at three o'clock in the afternoon, amidst a storm, so dreadful all over Europe, that it seemed to threaten the wreck of nature, after living fifty-nine years. The day on which he died was likewise much taken notice of, it being the anniversary of his most glorious successes at Dunbar and Worcester.

Historians are not more particular in their accounts of the minute actions of any great man than those of Oliver, and perhaps never man commanded so particular an attention to all his words and ways, deeply politic as he was in all he said and did. We shall endeavour to preserve the middle path between uninformative brevity and tedious prolixity, in what we have to say of this glorious usurper.

Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntingdon, of a good family of Welsh extraction; their name being originally Williams; but one of his ancestors marrying the sister of the famous Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, in the reign of Henry VIII. a son by that marriage took that name, and transmitted it to his posterity. Oliver made no figure in the world before the breaking out of the civil war. We have seen by what steps and incidents he mounted afterwards to power, which he could not have done, unless he had been endowed with a most extraordinary genius and capacity to discern the favourable incidents as they happened, and dexterously convert them to his own advantage; and with a courage and perseverance in the pro-cution of his measures which no danger could appal, no difficulties weary out. After he rose to sovereignty, under the name of protector, though his government was arbitrary, and supported only by military force, he did many things worthy of praise: he encouraged trade and commerce, maintained the honour of the nation, and in many instances shewed himself a magnanimous and intelligent governor. The English nation certainly never made a greater figure abroad since the days of Elizabeth, than it did under Cromwell.

Cromwell was in his disposition morose; he was sober, temperate, parsimonious, though not greedy of another's possessions; he was diligent and punctual in all public affairs. By his dexterous management he kept well with all sects; he did not persecute those of the Romish communion, nor those of the church of England; he had chaplains of all parties; he was an enthusiast with the fanatics, whom he had cheated, subdued, and no longer feared; and would laugh at these with the deists, placing confidence only in the independents, who could not subsist but through him. By this conduct he preserved to the last an authority which had been cemented with blood, and supported by fraud and artifice. Upon the whole, his greatest enemies allow, that had he not employed his great parts to evil ends, and by the most impious and traitorous practices usurped the government which did not belong to him, he might have filled the first posts in it with dignity and reputation to himself, and advantage to his country.

Cromwell was married to Elizabeth, daughter to sir James Burchier, by whom he had two sons, Richard, who succeeded him, and Henry, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and four daughters, viz. Bridget, married to lieutenant-general Ireton, Elizabeth, to John Claypole, of Northamptonshire, esq. Mary, to the lord viscount Falconbridge; and Frances, to the honourable Robert Rich; all of them ladies of incomparable accomplishments.

Cromwell had a most pompous funeral bestowed upon him, and his body was in all appearance interred in Westminster abbey: but some say it was wrapped in lead, and sunk below-bridge in the river Thames; and others affirm it to have been buried in Naseby field.

Notwithstanding the jarring interests which prevailed at this time, Richard, Cromwell's eldest son, was, immediately on the death of his father, proclaimed protector in London. Far from meeting with any opposition, the whole nation seemed to acknowledge his authority: Fleetwood and Desborough, though secretly discontented with the preference that had been shewn to Richard, as well as to his father, in the government, made the most abject professions of duty to the new protector: Henry Cromwell, Richard's brother, who governed Ireland with great ability, secured him the obedience of that kingdom: general George Monk, who was, with the army under his command, absolute master in Scotland, being greatly attached to his family, immediately proclaimed him in that kingdom: the army, the navy, recognized his title: above ninety addresses were sent up from different counties and corporations, felicitating him on his succession: foreign ministers vied with each other in the usual compliments, and treated him with the same respect as they had done his father. But we shall soon have occasion to see that all this compliance compliance, especially on the part of the English, was no better than a deceitful calm, which suited the views of all parties, as a breathing-time for concerting their own ends. No one person could have been found more unexceptionable for this purpose than Richard was; who, not having the talents of his father, could not have the same fortune; his sceptre was not supported by the sword; and as he wanted the resolution and dissimulation of Oliver, he knew not either how to make himself feared by the army, nor how to manage the different sects and parties which divided the nation.

Richard soon found himself treated with contempt, and even insolence, by his father's council, and therefore thought to secure his authority by convoking a parliament, which sat on the twenty-seventh of January, 1659. It consisted, like the former, of two houses, one of which was formed of the principal officers, representing the peers, and the other of deputies from the counties of England, Scotland, and Ireland, representing the three kingdoms; and although there were a great many republicans in the house of commons, who held long debates about the Other House, and other points in the Humble Petition and Advice; yet Richard's friends at last prevailed, and he was recognized protector by the parliament. But, before it met, several cabals had been set on foot by discontented persons against his government. His uncle Desborough was a republican, and his brother Fleetwood a violent fanatic presbyterian; consequently both averse to the government of a single person. Fleetwood was the idol of the army, whom Richard had disoblged by the promoting some officers they disliked: Lambert and Ludlow, with many other officers whom Oliver had laid aside, came forth from their retreats, and joined the council against the new protector. Some of these, under a shew of friendship, advised him to call up to London as many officers as could be spared from the regiments quartered in different parts of the country, for the better supporting him in his authority, if the parliament should not prove favourable to him.

Richard fell into the snare, never suspecting that it was designed only to strengthen the combination against him, and ordered all the officers that could be spared to repair to London. These constituted a numerous assembly, which met frequently at Fleetwood's house, and because he dwelt in Wallingford-house, the party were known by the name of the Wallingford-cabal. As soon as they were all assembled, they assumed the name of the Great Council of the Army; and being actuated by Fleetwood, Desborough, and their associates, they presented a petition to the protector, demanding "that no member of the army should be subject to the civil magistrate; and that the officers should enjoy the privilege of chusing their own general." Richard, shocked at their presumption, and perceiving that their design was to make themselves independent of him, rejected their petition, and even threatened to dismiss them from the service, should they make such extravagant proposals for the future. Had this firmness been followed by a proper spirit, it might have put an end to all the intrigues of the cabal; but it went no farther than words, and rather encouraged than daunted the petitioners, who presented a remonstrance to the parliament, demanding that Fleetwood should be appointed general of the army.

The commons, dreading their designs, passed a vote, that there should be no assembly or general council of officers without the protector's consent or by his authority; and that no person should be permitted to exercise an employment in the army, until after he should have taken an oath that he would not interrupt the deliberations of the commons. This measure immediately brought matters to a crisis. The officers, conscious of their own power, resolved to compel Richard to part with this parliament, so unfavourable to their views. They brought up their forces to Whitehall, seized all the avenues, and Desborough, a man of a rough and clownish disposition, attended by a strong guard, demanded an audience of the protector, and required him, in the name of all the officers, to dissolve the parliament. Richard at first refused; but upon Desborough's threatening him that they were resolved to obtain their request by some means or other, he complied; and the parliament having adjourned for three days, he published a proclamation, on the twenty-second of April, 1659, declaring them dissolved. By this act the protector was considered by every one as effectually deposed.

The council of officers having thus assumed the supreme authority, began to consider what form of government they should establish; and, after much debate, it was resolved to retain the appearance of civil authority, and to restore the long parliament, which, having brought Charles I. to the block, had been so disgracefully dismissed by Oliver Cromwell, in 1658. This parliament, which was entirely at the devotion of the army, met on the eighth of May in the house (having chosen Lenthall their old speaker) to the number of forty-two; and the presbyterian members who had been excluded, attempted to re-assume their seats; but they would not admit of such troublesome associates, and the army supported them in their renunciation of those members. This assembly was so hated for their former tyranny, that the people in general could not forbear deriding them under the denomination of the Rump, in allusion to their being the most inconsiderable and ignoble part of the parliament.

One of the first public acts of this parliament, was to summon all their members together who were at a distance from London, and to publish a declaration concerning their meeting, and of their intentions to proceed in the government, without a single person, kingship, or house of peers. They next chose a committee of safety (to which all officers, soldiers, and ministers of justice, were to give due obedience), consisting of Fleetwood, Haselrig, Vane, Ludlow, Sydenham, Salaway, and Jones, members of the house; to those were added Lambert, Desborough, and Berry, who were not of the house; and Scot, another member: and the time of their continuance was to be for five days, that is, till they could agree upon a council of state.

Richard Cromwell still remained at Whitehall, and many of the Wallingford-house officers continued to tamper with him. This came to the ears of the chief republicans; upon which the lord chief-justice St. John and sir Gilbert Pickering were ordered by the house of commons to repair to him, to require him to sign a formal abdication of the government. Had Richard possessed one spark of spirit, he had still a fine game to play: the Danish ambassador, Petrum, offered him any terms if he would declare for Charles, and to bind himself and his master to make them good. Richard, it is true, had at this time little or no influence in the public councils: but there still was a party in the army who would have been ready, under the sanction of his name, to have declared against the parliament: even Fleetwood and Sydenham, two of the council of state, with several other members, refused to take the oath prescribed by the parliament against the government of a single person; and a vote of the house passed for dispensing with their taking it. Several warm speeches had been made in the house in his favour, and great opposition was made to the promotion of all officers who were known to be enemies to the Cromwell family, or the government of a single person. Richard, however, signed his abdication, gave in a list of his debts, and sent a very dutiful letter to the parliament, expressing his desire to live quietly under their allegiance and protection.

Thus fell suddenly from the pinnacle of fortune, but, by rare felicity, without any hurt or injury, the family of the Cromwells. Richard continued to enjoy an estate, which was very small, and loaded too with a large debt, which he had contracted for the funeral of his father. After the Restoration, though he escaped with impunity, he chose to retire to the continent, till the spirit of party faction should in some measure be abated. Some time after he returned to England, where he lived to a great old age, not dying till towards the latter end of queen Anne's reign*.

There being a great number of republicans in the army and among the inferior officers, and both Fleetwood and Lambert having been disappointed in their expectation of succeeding Oliver, will account for the strong and early combination against Richard. Lambert was ambitious of being a second Cromwell, but as he could not compass his end whilst Fleetwood was general, he complied with the rest in restoring the rump-parliament, in hopes that he should be able to manage Fleetwood as Cromwell had managed Fairfax. But to follow the parliament in their proceedings.

Upon the resignation of Richard Cromwell, they proceeded to appoint Fleetwood commander in chief; they ordered that all commissions should be signed by the speaker of the house; they voted that Ireland should be governed by commissioners appointed in parliament, and recalled Henry Cromwell to London. He obeyed the order with a good grace, though he might have given them abundance of trouble, for he had a great influence among the troops in that kingdom, and was beloved by the people for his mild and upright administration. The parliament dreading the power of the superior officers, whom they knew were averse to their government, began to new-model the army; the committee for examining commissioners cashiered many officers whom they suspected, and filled their places with others in whom they could confide: they would have practised the same method with the troops under Monk, but he was no sooner apprized of their intentions than he wrote letters to the parliament, complaining of their design to sap his authority, and hinting that it would not be for their interest to drive him to extremities. They did not think it prudent to quarrel with an officer of his ability, at the head of twelve thousand veterans, supported by the whole Scottish nation; and therefore they recalled the commission they had granted. They continued the tax of thirty-five thousand pounds a month, which had been imposed by the parliament during Oliver's protectorship; they appointed commissioners for the civil government of Ireland, and bestowed the chief command of the forces of that kingdom upon Edmund Ludlow, an experienced officer and a rigid republican.

We purposely omit many particulars of these transactions, and others in the Journals of the parliament, as their constituting a council of state for the more immediate executive power of the commonwealth, the nomination of judges, commissioners of the great-seal, and commissioners of the navy, and colonel Henry Cromwell's letter to the parliament when he submitted to its authority, as not very essentially pertinent to this history.

Fleetwood and his friends were troubled at the restriction of his commission, yet he dissembled his passion, and yielded to necessity, till a more favourable conjuncture might give him opportunity to enlarge his power; however, both he, Desborough, Lambert, and many of them, were dissatisfied with the way of receiving their commissions from the hands of the speaker, and would have remonstrated against it; but by enquiring into the temper of the inferior officers, they found them well enough affected towards it, and therefore did not proceed against it for that time: and Fleetwood himself, to dissemble his acquiescence with great submission and protestation of obedience to the parliament, received his commission in the house, from the hands of the speaker, as did all the rest of the officers in and about London, who had commands in the army.

The parliament, however, had not sat long before differences began to arise, as usual, between them and the principal officers of the military. The parliament meditated no less than to bring the army under absolute subjection to their authority, while the commanders, aware of their design, bent their whole study to preserve their posts and influence over the inferior officers and soldiery.

But before this animosity arose to any height, they had information of divers plots forming by the royalists, in different parts of the kingdom, with whom the presbyterians from this time seem to have joined, in hopes of freeing themselves from the restraints the independents kept them under. The designs of the king's party were, however, frustrated by means of the timely intelligence Thurloe, the secretary of state, had from Richard Willes, who, being in great confidence with the king and his little court, was entrusted by them with all their cabinet-secrets. This man had suffered himself to be bribed by Oliver, and continually betrayed all the resolves of Charles and his friends. The only rising of any consequence was in Cheshire, where sir George Booth having got together about five hundred men, seized the city of Chester, and published a manifesto against the parliament. In the mean time his majesty removed from Brussels to Calais, to be ready if any fortunate event should invite him over; and the duke of York joined him from Breda. Colonel Ireland at the same time declared for the king at Liverpool; and Mr. Brooks, one of the members of the long parliament, willing to expiate his former mistakes, cordially joined with them for the freedom of his country.

The parliament, alarmed at these proceedings, caused all the houses in and about London to be seized, and all the avenues to the city to be guarded, and several detachments of horse and foot to be placed in the roads from the west and north-west parts of the kingdom. Lambert was sent, about the beginning of August, with a brigade, against sir George Booth and his party: the lord Mordaunt, who was suspected of being a principal agent for the king, was summoned, on great penalty, to appear; and Brooks and some other members of the house, whom they suspected to be engaged in the royal cause, were, on the penalty of one hundred pounds each, required to attend the service of the house. The parliament next sent to Dunkirk for three regiments, to strengthen the army; and colonel Zanchy brought out of Ireland his regiment of horse and Axtell's regiment of foot, which landing in Anglesey, marched to join Lambert, who, at his leaving London, had not above fifteen hundred men with him, but by the conjunction of these and other troops, on his march, increased to about five thousand. Sir George Booth had not above half that number; and those he had were without any order or discipline, most of them being noblemen and gentlemen of quality, aspiring every one to command, whilst nobody obeyed. Sir George Booth having intelligence of Lambert's drawing near to him, thought to have got a day's march before him into Lancashire, to have increased his numbers; and to gain time, he and sir Thomas Middleton sent a trumpeter with two ministers, to shew the ground of their raising an army, and desired a treaty to save the effusion of blood, to which Lambert agreed, on condition they would first lay down their arms, and surrender to him the garrisons in their power. To this there was no reply; but some of Lambert's men pressed so hard upon Booth, that, at a bridge near Northwich, a sharp encounter ensued between the forces of each party: the royalists defended the pass very courageously, till they were overpowered by numbers. Captain Morris, a gallant loyal gentleman, was killed, and some few others of Booth's party; of Lambert's very few fell, and those of no great note. All the vanquished dispersed themselves: sir George Booth and sir Thomas Middleton made their escape; the lord Kilmarry, Mr. Brooks, major-general Egerton, sir William O'Neil, and others, were taken prisoners, and all the garrisons immediately submitted to Lambert. Sir George Booth was, however, soon after seized at Newport Pagnel, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

In the mean time Dr. Nicholas Monk, an eminent divine, brother to the general, and a most zealous friend to the royal family, came over from Holland to London, in his way to Scotland, where he was sent to see if he could engage his brother to promote his majesty's cause, and was directed to receive farther instructions from sir John Grenville. He first applied to Mr. Clarges, brother-in-law to Monk, and communicated his business to him; and afterwards to Grenville, who much encouraged him in his undertaking, and shewed him two letters he had received from his majesty, one to general Monk and the other to himself. Clarges had been sent by the parliament, upon the resignation of Richard, to Scotland, to persuade the general to acknowledge their government, and therefore he did not chuse to appear openly in this affair, well knowing that the least suspicion of his actions from those in power, might make him useless to the service he wished well to; however, when the doctor arrived in Scotland, he found means to prevail so far on his brother, the general, not a little encouraged by the news of sir George Booth's success, that the latter resolved to march into England in support of the loyalists under arms; but as he had many seditious officers in his army, who were spies upon all his actions, he was obliged to be very wary and circumspect in his proceedings; and the news of the fatal defeat of sir George Booth arriving, he laid aside for the present all design of declaring himself.

But the success which Lambert had met with in quelling the rising of the loyalists was so far from establishing the authority, that it served only to precipitate the ruin of the parliament. Lambert, conscious of his own strength, and of the extreme weakness of the rump, was no less dangerous to them than Booth: he made use of a thousand pounds, voted him as a reward for his service, in bribing the officers under his command, who all swore to stand true to his interests. In pursuance of his advice they framed a petition, and sent it signed to the parliament, demanding that they would comply with the contents of the address formerly presented by the council of Wallingford-house; that they would establish general Fleetwood in his command, which, according to his present commission, would expire in a few months; that Lambert should be appointed lieutenant-general, Desborough general of the cavalry, and Monk general of the infantry; that they would take vengeance on those communities which had assisted the enemy in the late insurrections; and regulate the corporations in such a manner as to exclude from the magistracy all such as had expressed their affection for a commonwealth. This petition, dated at Derby, was communicated to Fleetwood for his approbation, before it should be presented to parliament. But sir Arthur Haselrig having received intimation of their scheme, communicated his intelligence to the house; Fleetwood being interrogated on the subject, owned the design, and three officers, who brought it to town, delivered a copy of the petition to the speaker. The house having taken the substance of it into deliberation, voted, "that to have other officers than those appointed by parliament, would be useless, chargeable, and dangerous to the commonwealth."

Monk's conduct was all this while so impetrate, that it can only be accounted for by supposing him to have resolved to be determined by events, and to chuse his party as they should present. He knew himself to be hated on many accounts by Fleetwood and Lambert, and that all their courtship to him had proceeded from their fear of what he could do against them. He had therefore again and again assured the parliament of his his resolution to stand by them at all hazards. At the same time his behaviour in regard to those whom he knew to be the king's friends, gave Charles great hopes that he meant him no ill. The parliament however, encouraged by his professions, and extremely incensed at the above petition, immediately dismissed Lambert, Desborough, and some other officers who had signed it; revoked Fleetwood's commission, and appointed commissioners to govern the army for a limited time: but the army paid no regard to their acts or resolutions. Lambert, drawing some regiments into the city, secured all the avenues to Westminster-hall; and when the speaker arrived in his coach, he in person laid hold of the horses, and, turning them round, very politely conducted him home. The other members were prevented meeting by the like stratagem, and two regiments which the parliament had ordered to mount in Old Palace-yard, as a guard to the house, finding they could not stem the torrent, quietly departed to their quarters.

Thus the rump-parliament was again deposed by the army, on the thirteenth of October, five months after they had been restored. And now there was a second anarchy of a few days, which was rendered tolerable by the army's being kept in exact discipline, and by the officers, who had now the supreme authority, appointing a council of ten persons, out of their own body, to take care of such affairs as were most pressing. Then they declared Fleetwood their general, Lambert their lieutenant-general, and Desborough commissary-general of the horse. At length, on the twenty-sixth of October, they established a committee of safety, consisting of twenty-three persons, and entrusted to them the government, who were to consider farther of a settlement, "without a king, single person, or house of peers."

During these distractions in England, the king, disheartened by the miscarriage of every enterprize in his favour, was determined to try the weak resources of foreign aid; and he repaired to the Pyrenees, where the ministers of France and Spain were about this time engaged in conferences for composing all disputes between the two crowns, by a final treaty. Don Lewis de Haro, the Spanish plenipotentiary, gave the young monarch a very kind and cordial reception, and expressed his inclination, had the low condition of Spain permitted him, to furnish assistance to the unhappy king. The politic Mazarine, pretending the alliance of France with the English commonwealth, would not so much as deign him an interview; nor could Charles, even by concessions that, if true, do him no great credit, obtain aught but empty professions of respect and friendship. But, while every thing wore such an unfavourable aspect, blind chance (or what at least we blindly call so), by a surprising revolution, was now preparing the way for Charles to mount the throne of his ancestors.

Monk, who hated Lambert, no sooner heard of that demagogue's proceedings in London, and that he governed the army and nation in the name of Fleetwood, than he resolved to march out of Scotland, with the best of his troops, and restore the rump-parliament. This measure rendered him generally suspected of having formed some deep designs, either in his own favour, or that of the king, yet nothing certain could be fixed upon, as he all along used the most profound dissimulation, and opened himself only as circumstances offered. He now wrote letters to Fleetwood and Lambert, wherein he complained "of their violation of faith to the parliament, and declared his resolution to endeavour to restore them to their power, against all opposition whatsoever. Fleetwood, Lambert, and Desborough, were struck with consternation at this resolution, so peremptorily signified to them, and sent to desire Clarges to come to them: who, when he came, after some question of his knowledge of the general's proceedings (to which he gave very cautious answers), they desired him to go into Scotland, with colonel Talbot (whose regiment was then at Edinburgh), to prevail with Monk for a treaty of mediation, to prevent the effusion of blood: they said they chose Talbot to accompany him because he was grateful to the general. Clarges was very glad of this opportunity to get away (for he feared to be much worse treated), and they were so pressing for his departure, that they allowed him but three hours preparation for his journey. Monk, on his side, was indefatigable in carrying his design into execution: he assembled all his officers, the chief of whom he knew to be devoted to his service, having occasionally, and from time to time, purged his army of all malecontents or suspicious persons, and laid before them his resolution to march into England, and restore the parliament; to which they unanimously gave their consent, promising to stand by him with their lives and fortunes: and every precaution was taken by the general and his friends to strengthen themselves against the prevailing faction in England.

During these preparations colonel Talbot and Clarges arrived at Edinburgh, on the second of November, with the proposals for a treaty between general Monk and the committee of safety: they were both very well received by Monk, especially Clarges, his brother-in-law, whom he thought himself happy to have with him to assist his design. By this gentleman's advice he consented to a negotiation, in order to gain time, and sent three of his officers, namely, Wilkes, Cloberry, and Knight, as commissioners to treat with the committee, though they were expressly ordered to start such obstacles as should protract the negotiation. They found Lambert at York, with a body of forces, to oppose the progress of Monk, whom he hated as a rival in military fame and preferment. He said he was sufficiently authorized to treat with them; but when they demanded the restoration of the parliament, he owned he had no instructions on that head, and they proceeded to London, where the committee immediately assented to all their proposals. The treaty was accordingly signed on the fifteenth of November, both sides engaging to act vigorously in opposition to Charles Stuart.

The nation, mean while, had fallen into a state of perfect anarchy; and by refusing the payment of all taxes, reduced the troops to the greatest extremities. While Lambert was collecting his forces at Newcastle, Haselrig and Morley entered Portsmouth, and declared for the parliament. A party sent to quell the insurrection, were induced by their commander to embrace the same interest. The city apprentices rose in a body, and insisted on a free parliament. Though they were suppressed by colonel Hewson, a man who had once been a cobbler, but was now possessed of a high rank in the army, the city still retained its ill-humour, and discovered discovered marks of the highest dissatisfaction. It even erected a kind of separate government, and exercised a supreme authority within itself. Admiral Lawson with his squadron entered the river, and declared for the parliament. Haselrig and Morley, informed of these events, quitted Portsmouth, and hastened towards London. The regiments in the neighbourhood of that city, were persuaded by their old officers, who had been dismissed by the committee of safety, once more to espouse the cause of the parliament. Desborough's regiment, which was sent to Lambert to assist his friends, no sooner reached St. Alban's, than it declared for the same assembly.

Lenthall, the speaker, at the desire of the officers, resumed his former authority, and, on the twenty-sixth of December, assembled the parliament, which had already been twice expelled with so much contempt and ignominy.

Their first step was to annul the act against the payment of excise and customs: they next chose commissioners for assigning quarters to the soldiers: and, without taking the least notice of Lambert, they enjoined the forces under his command to repair directly to those garrisons which were allotted them.

Lambert's situation was now totally desperate; by these orders of the parliament his army was rendered entirely useless to him; and, which was still worse, the few troops that remained with him, thinking to make their court to those in power, or perhaps to gratify some pique of their own, put their general under an arrest, and he was brought up to London, and committed prisoner to the Tower.

Monk having received a supply of thirty thousand pounds from the Scots, and taken proper precautions for maintaining the peace of that kingdom, entered England on the second of January, 1660. On his way he heard of the disbanding of the army, as also that the lord Fairfax, with some of the chief gentlemen in Yorkshire, were in arms, demanding a free parliament. This was going a step farther than Monk had yet proposed to do; however, he was received with open arms by the lord Fairfax and all his friends, who had taken possession of that city for a free parliament. The rump now grew to be more the public detestation than the army had been before, and every step which Monk advanced forwards, occasioned some fresh declaration or association of the counties for a free parliament. The rump then began to think that they had made the breach between themselves and the Wallingford officers too irreconcilable; they suspected that Monk had something farther in view than restoring them, and would have been better pleased had he remained in Scotland: however, to put a good face upon the matter, and if possible to stop his farther progress, the house sent him a letter, wherein they informed him of their having re-assembled, and attributed the restitution of their authority wholly to his fidelity, care, and courage. This message was far from being pleasing to the general; on the contrary, he looked upon the event it announced as one of the crossiest accidents that could have befallen him. He was under a thousand perplexities how to act; for by the parliament's over-hasty resumption of their power, backed with a great army newly returned to their obedience, he despaired of being able to compass his designs, and thought no longer of continuing in arms than till the first opportunity should be offered him to lay them down, and retire; for he expected they would not have thought their sitting safe till his arrival in London with his army, and then he would have restored all the other members with them, without undertaking to judge the difference between them. Nevertheless he found pretences to continue his march, still professing it was purely for the service of the parliament. At Lancaster he was met by a deputation from London, with an address praying the restoration of the members who had been excluded in 1648, when the army put a force upon the parliament, in order to accomplish their designs upon the late king.

In this, and the other numerous addresses sent to him upon the road, the presbyterians seemed to have had a great share; as those secluded members were mostly of the presbyterian stamp, they were desirous now to rescue themselves out of the power of the independents at any rate. Oliver had, indeed, suffered their church-government to continue, but with a full liberty to the other sects, which was their great grievance. The parliament finding that Monk was in no humour to stop his march, and well knowing themselves incapable to give him law, thought it most prudent to temporize. Accordingly, on the twelfth of January, an act was voted to justify Monk's marching into England; and on the sixteenth they voted a thousand pounds a year to be settled on him, and that Scot and Robinson, two of their members, should be sent to compliment him on the road. Scot and Robinson were designed as no better than spies upon Monk, and their observation of those who seemed to be chiefly in his favour, and resorted mostly to him, with the universal disposition of the country of England for a free parliament, being communicated to the heads of the faction, gave them great uneasiness. His army was not quite six thousand strong: had the members of parliament been united among themselves, or had they dared to trust the experienced officers under them, they might have effectually ruined his scheme: instead of that, upon his approach to St. Alban's, the parliament tamely complied with a letter sent from him to the house, desiring that the regiments quartered in and about London might be ordered to retire to a greater distance, to make room for his troops. Lambert was now in the Tower, and Fleetwood and the rest lost their courage, as doubting whether they should be able to preserve the command over their inferior officers, and therefore tamely acquiesced in the orders of the parliament for leaving London; but the common men were less submissive, for about four thousand of them mutinied, and were with difficulty prevented either from joining with the royalists in the city, or from marching out against Monk. The parliament considering this mutiny as a fresh insult upon their authority, in great terror pressed Monk to hasten his march, and he entered London the fourth of February. The next day he was introduced to the house with great solemnity, and received, by the mouth of Lenthall, the public thanks for the great services which he had done his country.

During the late distractions, the payment of taxes had been interrupted; and though the parliament, upon their restoration, had renewed their orders for all collections and impositions, yet so little little authority did they possess in the nation, that the people obeyed their commands with great backwardness and reluctance. The common council of London absolutely refused to submit to an assessment demanded of them; and openly declared, that, till a free and legal parliament was assembled, they would never consent to make any payment. This refusal would immediately have destroyed the authority of the parliament; they were, therefore, resolved, upon this occasion, to make at once a full trial of their own strength and of the general's fidelity.

On the ninth of February orders were given that part of the northern army should be quartered in London; that its posts and chains should be taken away, and its portcullices destroyed: Monk was ordered to execute these resolutions against the city, and to seize the persons of some of the most obnoxious amongst the citizens, that is to say, such as had been loudest in demanding a free parliament. Monk knew so well how to dissemble, that he marched into the city, and in part obeyed the orders; but thinking that he ought to make himself sure of one party before he entirely broke with another, he therefore, after some secret consultations with the disaffected citizens, sent a letter to the parliament, informing them of what he had done, and begging they would mitigate the severity of their order; but the parliament, on receipt of this letter, repeated their orders, that the gates and portcullices of the city should be forthwith destroyed by Monk, and they dissolved the common-council by a vote. On the eleventh of February they voted that no person, engaged in any conspiracy or design in behalf of the royal family, should either elect or be elected into parliament. In the afternoon of the same day they received a petition from Praise God Barebones, signed by a great number of persons, desiring that every individual of the kingdom should be compelled to take the oath of abjuration*; and returned the fanatic thanks for his affection towards the commonwealth. At the same time the commission for the army being expired, a fresh commission was given to Monk, Haselrig, Morley, and Allured; but it was voted, that there should be a quorum of the commission, who might act without Monk.

That general now began to think he had carried his dissimulation to the farthest stretch, having punctually complied with the last order of the house, to dismantle the city; and therefore, after making many apologies for what he had done, declaring it to have been purely in compliance with the orders of the odious rump, whom now he said he found to be a set of merciless unrelenting tyrants, he and his officers joined in a letter to the parliament, peremptorily requiring them to issue out writs for filling up the vacancies in their own body, and to declare a period to their own sitting, so that they might make room for a free parliament. After this he threw off the mask with the parliament, and declared his resolution to the city, begging that they would join with him in his attempts for the settlement of the nation. This declaration turned the late mourning of the city into a rapture of joy, which was demonstrated by the ringing of bells, illuminations, and bonfires†.

The parliament foreseeing the approaching danger, resolved to make another effort for the preservation of their power; they dispatched a committee to the general, and endeavoured, if possible, to gain him to their side; they even went so far as to offer him the supreme authority. But Monk would not trust them, and retired to his own friends in the city, where he formed and modelled a new militia, but tho' without doing any farther than declaring for a commonwealth, under a free parliament, and for re-admitting the excluded members. Ludlow, and those members at Westminster who had any spirit left, were for adjourning to the Tower; but their motion was disregarded. In short, on the twelfth of February, the secluded members attended the general in a body to Whitehall; from whence, after receiving their promise to call a free parliament, and then dissolve themselves, he gave them a guard to the parliament-house, where they took their seats. The leaders of the independent and republican party, surprized at the sudden appearance of the excluded members amongst them, withdrew from the house.

The parliament, thus altered, repealed the act for abjuring Charles Stuart, as also the engagement to be faithful to the commonwealth without a king or house of peers; passed several other votes tending to the restoration of monarchy; and then, having issued out writs for calling a new parliament, and appointed a new council of state, composed of men of prudence and moderation, they dissolved themselves on the sixteenth of March.

Scot, Haselrig, and some others of the zealous republicans, were greatly alarmed at these proceedings of the parliament, which they took to be an inevitable prognostic of introducing the king; and though they so much affected power as to endure no rival in it, yet they chose rather to have the general take the dominion of the three kingdoms upon himself, than to have the king restored, from whose just resentment they thought they had every thing to fear. They consulted privately with some officers of the army, whom they most trusted; and those approved so well of the expedient, that they waited on the general at Whitehall, to treat with him about it; but Monk would by no means encourage any temptations of that kind, and sent them away with a severe reprimand. Probably the experience of Cromwell's fate gave him reason to avoid the rock on which that family had split.

Before the new parliament met, Lambert, having escaped out of the Tower, put himself at the head of some discontented troops, in Northamptonshire. But Ingoldsby, being immediately sent against him by Monk, came unawares upon

* The oath was in the following words: "I do hereby swear, that I do renounce the pretended title of Charles Stuart, and of the whole line of the late king James, and of every other person, as a single person, pretending, or which shall pretend, to the crown or government of these nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them: and that I will, by the grace of Almighty God, be true, faithful, and constant to the parliament and commonwealth; and will oppose the bringing in, or setting up, any single person, or house of lords, and every of them, in this commonwealth."

† The most comical expedients were employed to ridicule that odious assembly. At every bonfire rumps were roasted; and when these could no longer be found, pieces of flesh were cut into that form; and the funeral of the parliament, the populace said, was solemnized by these marks of hatred and derision.

them, dispersed them, and took Lambert prisoner, who was again sent to the Tower.

Soon after the dissolution of the parliament, Monk, by the intervention of one Morrice, a gentleman of Devonshire, nearly allied to Monk, and one in whom he had always reposed the most unlimited confidence, opened himself to sir John Grenville, whom he engaged to be an agent between himself and Charles; and, to distinguish himself above all others of his profession or religion who pressed for the restoration, he secretly agreed that Charles should be brought in without any limitation; and imparted to him an important piece of intelligence, which he had casually learned by the Portuguese ambassador, from which he had understood that Charles was not safe in the territories of Spain, and that he ought to remove to Breda, because the court of Spain intended to detain him until either Jamaica or Dunkirk, or both, were restored to that crown. The reader may easily conceive the joy of the king upon this message. Notwithstanding the high spirits in which his followers were, he, and the wisest about him were extremely damped at being in a manner forsaken by all the powers of Europe, with nothing but the prospect of want before their eyes; he knew that the kindness of the Spaniards would soon be at an end, when he could no longer be useful to their interests. He heard of the re-settlement of the rump, of their triumphs over the army, of Monk's warm declaration for a commonwealth: and he had been so often deceived by the sanguine hopes of his friends, that they added to his dejections.

The council of state was all this while sitting, and though Monk daily sent to, and received messages from the king, and now acted under his commission; nay, though Montagu, who was at the head of the fleet, offered himself, and all under his command, without any reserve, to the king; yet such was Monk's caution, that all the officers of the militia, before they were put in commission, were obliged to swear solemnly to acknowledge the lawfulness of the parliament's war against the late king. This gave Charles little or no disturbance: he had by this time removed to Breda, where he received applications from all parts of England, and the court was as splendid as if he had been already on the throne. It was with no small satisfaction he heard of Lambert's defeat, and his imprisonment, with that of Cobbel, Creed, and others of his fanatical officers; of the quashing the meetings of the army; and displacing all the suspected officers in the fleet; and, above all, of the favourable prospect of the elections into parliament. His only difficulty now was, how to comply with Monk's advice, which, in his situation, was little less than a command, that all might remain in possession of what they had; that liberty of conscience should be granted for all religions; and that an act of grace should be passed, so extensive as to comprehend even the murderers of his father. Charles shewed both great virtue and great wisdom, by neither denying nor granting those matters, but referring all to the consideration of the ensuing parliament. This was very agreeable to Monk; and Grenville received the following letters from Charles, to be by him delivered, viz. one to the general and the army, one to the house of commons, one to the house of lords (no notice of whom had been taken in the summons to parliament), one to the fleet, one to the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and a declaration for the satisfaction of all his subjects. The letters themselves are to be found in all our common historians, but the substance is contained in the Declaration for the satisfaction of all subjects who should return to their allegiance, exclusive of those who should be hereafter excepted by parliament. As to matters of religion, he declared free liberty of conscience, and that no man should be disquieted, or called in question, for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom. As to matters of property, liable to actions at law on account of their titles, he leaves to the same authority from which they were derived, that of a parliament; and, to quiet the army under general Monk, he promised them all their arrears, and to continue the soldiers in his service on the same pay and condition they then had.

The elections for the approaching parliament, which all this time was carried on in favour of the king's party, being completed, and every thing appearing ripe for the restoration, the new parliament assembled on the twenty-fifth of April, in two houses, that of lords and commons. The house of lords consisted at first of no more than ten peers, and all, or most of them presbyterians, viz. the earls of Manchester, Northumberland, Lincoln, Suffolk, and Denbigh, the viscount Say and Seale, and the lords Wharton, Hunston, Grey of Wark, and Maynard. The writs that had issued being in the name of the keepers of the liberties of England, had made no mention of the house of lords; but the latter thought nothing that had happened could disquiet them, and the present temper of the times gave them no reason to apprehend any objection.

The house of commons chose sir Harbottle Grimstone for their speaker. This gentleman, with other presbyterians, had gone as far as he could in contributing to the ruin of the late king; but stopped when his personal death was under consideration. On the first day of their meeting, the commons received a message from the lords; and on the second day Grimstone, by order of the house, gave thanks to Monk for conquering all their and the kingdom's enemies without the effusion of blood. On the twenty-seventh of April they ordered, that the great business of the settlement of the nation should be taken into consideration on the first day of May, to which time they adjourned. It was, in the mean while, generally understood that the restoration of the royal family was to take place; but how, or in what manner, none had ventured to pronounce: every mouth, however, was now filled with invectives against the memory of Cromwell, and in expressing a detestation and abhorrence of the inhuman murder of their sovereign.

On the first of May, when the house re-assembled after its adjournment, Mr. Annesley was the first who mentioned sir John Grenville's having delivered a letter from the king to the council of state; and the house being informed that sir John was at the door, he was immediately called in, and at the bar of the house presented all the letters and the Declaration, which he had from the king. These being severally read in each house, both lords and commons concurred in passing a vote, "That by the the fundamental laws of the kingdom, the government ought to be by the king, lords, and commons." It is incredible with what ardour both houses strove to express their affection and loyalty to the king on this occasion; but as the most substantial proof of their attachment, they voted a present of fifty thousand pounds to the king, ten thousand to the duke of York, and five thousand to the duke of Gloucester. A committee of lords and commons was appointed to draw up a dutiful and thankful answer to the king's letters and Declaration, and to invite his majesty to return and take possession of his dominions.

In a word, every step relating to this important event was taken with such zeal and unanimity, that, according to the expression of the noble historian of those times†, "one could not but wonder where those people dwelt, who had done all the mischief, and kept the king so long from enjoying the comfort and support of such excellent subjects. The king himself said, that it must surely have been his own fault, that he had not sooner taken possession of the throne, since every body was so zealous for restoring him to it."

On the eighth of May the king was proclaimed in Palace-yard, Whitehall, and at Temple-bar, the two houses attending at the solemnity, and the people rending the air with acclamations of joy. The intermediate time between the eighth and the twenty-ninth, which was the day of the king's entering London, was spent in preparing every thing for his reception. All imaginable methods were taken for stopping the farther waste of the lands of the king or the royalists; and great assiduity was shewn in securing the persons of the regicides, and the most criminal of those concerned in the late troubles.

The respect of foreign powers soon succeeded the submission of the king's subjects: Spain importuned him to return to the Low Countries, and take shipping in any of her maritime ports; Mazarine, the lately insulting and insolent minister of France, pressed him with the greatest earnestness to accept of Calais for the same purpose: Charles civilly declined them both, and after making a tour to the Hague, where he was magnificently received, he embarked on board the English fleet, which lay to receive him, under the command of admiral Montague; and made his public entry into London on the twenty-ninth of May (his birth-day), where he was received with the most extravagant demonstrations of joy.

Thus was this great revolution effected without any effusion of blood: but what is still more the object of wonder, is, that whereas so much blood had been spilt to compel Charles I. to come into terms with his people, to which it is certain he at last made large concessions, his son Charles II. should be received without any conditions at all. Upon this bishop Burnet, in his History of his own Times, tells us that Hale, afterwards lord chief-justice, did move, that a committee might be appointed to look into the propositions that had been made, and the concessions that had been offered by the late king, and that something similar thereto might be demanded of Charles, previous to his restoration. This motion was seconded, but by whom the bishop had forgot. Monk, it seems, was apprized of such a motion, and prepared for an answer to it: he observed, that if they stood debating and lingering longer before they declared themselves, he could neither answer for the peace of the nation, nor the disposition of the army; that the presence of the king must be immediate; and that being without an army or money, it was as much in the parliament to bind him down to conditions after he was restored, as before; and that those conditions, if obtained after the restoration, would be more binding, because agreed to by the king upon his throne, and not in a manner under the restraint of exile. That the two houses were afterwards too remiss in not pointing out the proper limitation of the king's authority, is not to be disputed; and to that remissness, says the bishop, may well be imputed all the errors of the succeeding reign*.

* This æra had the honour of producing the celebrated Milton, whose poems do honour to the nation that gave him birth, and indeed to human nature. He was Cromwell's secretary for the Latin tongue; though his genius seems to have been very little known to his employers, for he is mentioned by Whitlock as an obscure blind man, very unfit for his office. About the same time flourished sir William Davenant, sir John Denham, Waller, and Cowley, who, though but indifferent poets, acquired a good share of reputation. The republican principles of the age gave rise to the Oceana of Harrington, containing the idea of a perfect commonwealth: and the controversies and absurdities that deformed religion, encouraged Hobbes to write and publish his Leviathan. Among the eminent persons who died under Oliver's protectorship were the famous Mr. John Selden, the great antiquarian; the venerable Usher, archbishop of Armagh, who came over to England a little before the breaking out of the Irish massacre; and Dr. Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. The Restoration of King CHARLES II. to the REVOLUTION, which, with the foregoing Part, contains the Transactions of Eighty-seven Years.

P A R T XI.

A. D. 1660.

KING Charles I. being deprived of life by the hands of his rebellious subjects, on the thirtieth of January, 1649, in the manner already related, his eldest son prince Charles, then in the eighteenth year of his age, by unquestionable right succeeded to the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, immediately on that fatal event. Proclamation and coronation, the usual ceremonies attending royal succession, could not then have their due course, nor are they in this kingdom necessary circumstances of monarchy; for by our law, which admits of no interregnum, the successor to the crown has all the rights thereof from the first moment of the death of his predecessor. We are to consider Charles II. therefore, at the time of his restoration, in the twelfth year of his reign.

With monarchy the ancient order and discipline was restored both in church and state, and a round of magnificence and pleasures succeeded the gloomy ferocity which had so long taken possession of all minds. Charles introduced an excess of gallantry and diversions into the palace, yet stained with the blood of his father. The independents were shortly heard of no more; the puritans hid themselves; the spirit of the English nation underwent so total a change, that the late civil war became a subject of ridicule: the austere and gloomy sectarists, who had filled the kingdom with their enthusiastic notions, were now the butts of raillery to the gay and licentious courtiers. Cautious deism, which the king himself seemed openly to profess, became the reigning religion among the many others then in the kingdom.

If we would know the source of the principal events of this reign, it will be necessary to consider not only the character of Charles II. but that of the duke of York his brother, who bore the chief sway in the royal councils.

King Charles was endowed with many engaging qualities and excellent talents, which might have rendered his reign glorious, if he had made a better use of them. He was affable and good-natured, had a surprising ready wit, a solid judgment, and a deep penetration. But his other qualities were by no means correspondent: he was careless, indolent, and so immoderately addicted to pleasure, that he would sacrifice any thing to it, even the good of his kingdom. His court was filled with his mistresses, and his whole time and treasure were in a manner devoted to them: add to this, that, though he had embraced the popish religion abroad, in hopes of having the aid of the catholic princes towards the recovering the throne of his ancestors; yet he was so totally indifferent to all religion, that he mattered not whether popery or protestantism was the religion of England, so that he could be left to pursue his pleasure unmolested.

James, duke of York, the king's eldest brother, was of an active, violent, and vindictive temper, and such a confirmed bigot to popery, that he would would stick at nothing to promote its establishment; and with this view laboured to extend the prerogative, and to establish an arbitrary government. This then, joined with the indolence of the king, of which the duke of York made his advantage to favour the schemes he had formed, was the chief occasion of the distractions and animosities in the latter part of this reign; for it was some time after the Restoration, and as it were by insensible degrees, that these designs discovered themselves. After these remarks, it will be no longer necessary to detain the reader with any occasional comments on the principal transactions and events we are now about to relate.

Charles had no sooner taken possession of the throne, than he began to turn his attention towards the affairs of the public. The first object that ingrossed his care was the choice of his council, into which were admitted the most ancient men of the nation, without distinction of parties. The presbyterians, as well as the royalists, shared this honour; Annesley was made earl of Anglesey; sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, lord Ashley; Denzil Holles, lord Holles; the earl of Southampton, lord-treasurer; Edward Montagu, who had been one of Cromwell's admirals in conjunction with Blake, was made commander in chief of the fleet, and shortly after earl of Sandwich; George Monk, who had been made a knight of the garter at the king's landing, was continued general of all the forces, and created duke of Albemarle*. Sir Edward Hyde, a sworn enemy to the presbyterian party, and who had constantly attended the king in his exile, was created earl of Clarendon, and made high-chancellor and prime minister; the marquis, created duke of Ormond, steward of the household; the earl of Manchester, lord high chamberlain; sir Edward Nicholls and Sir William Morrice, secretaries of state; and in order to gratify the presbyterians, Calamy and Baxter, two of their favourite prelates, were appointed the king's chaplains.

As the parliament had been summoned without the king's consent, they received on his arrival only the title of Convention; but two days after, viz. May 31, the king went to the house, and gave his assent to an act for changing the convention into a parliament.

In the next place, special care was taken for the committing all military as well as civil affairs of great trust, into the hands of such persons as were judged most faithful to the king's service; so that the governments of all the most important fortresses in the kingdom, and the first commands of the several regiments of the army, were by the lord-general conferred upon such lords and other persons of honour as the king was pleased to recommend unto the lord-general for that purpose, until the army could conveniently be disbanded. Likewise, for the further settling of the militia of the nation, noblemen of the first rank and abilities were constituted lord-lieutenants of the several counties, each having under him, as deputy-lieutenant, such gentlemen of the same counties as had been most eminent for their loyalty and affection to his majesty and his royal house.

The king, in his declaration from Breda, had promised an indemnity to all criminals, but such as should be excepted by parliament. He now issued a proclamation, importing, that such of the late king's judges as did not surrender themselves within fourteen days, should have no pardon. Nineteen complied with this proclamation; some were taken in attempting to escape; others fled to the continent.

The act of oblivion or indemnity hung for some time in the house, owing to the opposition of the lords, who, enraged by the cruel treatment they had received from the republican party, were determined, besides the late king's judges, to condemn every one who had sat in any high court of justice; and this rigor made them begin to suspect that there was some court intrigue to invalidate the king's merciful declaration; but his majesty soon removed their scruples. He came to the house of peers, and in the most pathetic terms pressed them to pass the general indemnity. He also sent repeated messages to both houses to the same purport. At length the act passed, and received the royal assent on the 29th of August. Those who had an immediate share in the late king's death were then executed: even Cromwell, Ireton, Pride, and Bradshaw, and twenty others already dead, were attainted, and their estates confiscated. Philips and Haselrig underwent the same fate. Hutchenson and Laicelles were condemned in a fine, and declared incapable of exercising any employment. Vane and Lambert, two more of the king's judges, were likewise excepted. St. John and seventeen persons more were deprived of all benefits from this act, if they accepted or executed any office, either ecclesiastical, civil, or military. All who had sat in any illegal high court of justice, were disabled from bearing office. In a few days the regicides were tried and condemned. The indignation entertained against the atrocious crime which those men had committed, made the people rejoice and triumph in their punishment; while they, on the other hand, justified what they had done to the last, and looked upon themselves as martyrs in a glorious cause. Lambert, who was tried and condemned at the same time, was reprieved from death, but imprisoned for life in the island of Guernsey. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride, were taken up and hanged for a whole day at Tyburn, and then buried under the gallows. This may be true as to the three last, but whether the body taken up for Cromwell's was really his, may be doubted, from the uncertainty of the place of his burial, as before mentioned.

At the same time that the king passed the act of indemnity, he gave his assent to an act for a perpetual anniversary thanksgiving on the twenty-ninth of May, the day of his arrival in England. Mean while the parliament were employed in settling the

The titles of Albemarle and Beauchampe were conferred on him, because he was descended from Margaret, one of the daughters and coheirs of Richard Beauchampe, earl of Albemarle and Warwick, who was married to the famous warrior John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, well known in France in the reign of Henry V. whose son, John, had one daughter, married to Edward Grey, viscount Lisle; whose daughter and heir, Elizabeth Grey, was married to Arthur Plantagenet, a natural son of king Edward IV. who was in her right viscount Lisle; and Frances, one of the daughters and coheirs of the said viscount Lisle, was married to sir Thomas Monk, grandfather to the present duke of Albemarle. king's revenue. In this work they shewed an equal regard for maintaining the liberties of the nation and supporting the dignity of the crown.

The tenures of wards and liveries had long been considered as a public grievance. During the reign of James several attempts had been made to purchase this prerogative from the crown. In the time of the commonwealth, wardships and liveries had been utterly abolished: and even in the present parliament, before the king's restoration, a bill had been introduced, offering him an equivalent for these revenues. An hundred thousand pounds a year was the sum which the parliament proposed; and the king, sensible that these imports did not yield so much profit, readily accepted the offer. Half of the excise was granted in perpetuity to the crown as the fund for producing that revenue. Tonnage and poundage, and the other half of excise, were settled upon the king during life. The parliament went so far as to vote that the yearly revenue of the crown, for all charges, should amount to twelve hundred thousand pounds; a sum greater than any English monarch had ever before enjoyed. This revenue, however, was only voted: no funds were appointed, which would furnish above two thirds of that sum: the fulfilment of these engagements was left to the future consideration of parliament.

To disband the forces, so formidable by their numbers and valour, and so much accustomed to violence and outrage, was absolutely necessary for the public tranquillity; and, in order to enable his majesty to effect that purpose, an assessment was imposed of seventy thousand pounds a month. Having taken these steps towards compleating the settlement of the nation, the parliament thought proper to adjourn on the thirteenth of September, to the sixth of November following*.

In the midst of the joy for the Restoration, the king and the kingdom met with a sensible loss in the death of Henry, duke of Gloucester, his majesty's younger brother, which happened on the thirteenth of September, in the twenty-first year of his age. The king was never so deeply afflicted by any incident of his life: Gloucester was a young prince of many amiable qualities, had a clear judgment and a quick perception, and was warmly attached to the religion and constitution of his country; a quality in which his two brothers, the king and the duke of York, were unhappily very deficient.

The hierarchy, which had suffered the same fate with the monarchy, was now to be restored with it. His majesty judging the form of church-government which had been established in England, from the time of the Reformation until the late troubles, to be the most ancient and decent way of worship and discipline, and tending to uniformity in religion, made it one of his first businesses to restore the late extruded episcopacy to the dignity and authority they formerly exercised in the church of England; to which end he speedily proceeded to the nomination of such persons as were most eminent for their piety and learning, for supplying those sees which were become vacant since the first time of the abrogation of their power. Reynolds, Calamy, Baxter, Moreton, Bates, and Bowles, all eminent presbyterian ministers, were offered bishoprics and deaneries, though none accepted but Reynolds, who was made bishop of Norwich.

In October the princess dowager of Orange came over to England, to congratulate the king her brother on his restoration; and the queen-mother arrived in the following month, bringing with her the princess Henrietta, her youngest daughter, who, by the king her brother's consent, was married to the duke of Orleans. The princess of Orange had been but about two months in England, when she was taken ill of the small-pox, and died on the twenty-fourth of December, leaving only one son, William, prince of Orange, about ten years old, who was afterwards king of England by the name of William III.

The king now thought it high time to settle the peace of Scotland as well as that of his other dominions; and in order thereunto he summoned a parliament to meet at Edinburgh on December 12, and, by his proclamation in that kingdom, signified to all, that he relied so much on the loyalty, prudence, and care of his parliament, as absolutely to commit to them the trying and judging the conduct of his subjects during the late troubles, concerning which he declared himself ready to receive addresses and informations from his parliament or committee of state in Scotland, and no others; at the same time he assured them in the strongest terms, that he desired nothing so much as that his people should be settled in happiness, peace, and plenty, under his government; and that his own honour and the ancient prerogatives of the crown being vindicated, he purposed to grant a full and free pardon, by an act of indemnity.

For the government of Ireland, he made sir Maurice Eustace Kerl lord-chancellor, Roger, earl of Orrery, lord-president of Munster, and Charles Coote, earl of Montrath, lord president of Connaught, lords high-justices of that kingdom, who governed affairs there with great credit and moderation.

* Upon this occasion his majesty gave the royal assent to fourteen private and eight public acts; among the latter was the famous Act of Navigation, entitled, "An act for encouraging shipping and navigation, wherein it is enacted, that, from the first of September, 1660, no commodities shall be imported or exported out of any lands, islands, plantations, or territories, belonging unto, or which may belong to his majesty, his heirs and successors, in Asia, Africa, or America, in any other vessel but such as shall belong unto the people of England, Ireland, Wales, or Berwick, or are of them built, or do belong to them as the right owners, and whereof the master and three fourths of the mariners are English; and under penalty of all the goods imported or exported in other vessels, with all their guns, furniture, tackle, ammunition, and apparel, one third to his majesty, his heirs and successors; one third to the governor of such lands, islands, plantations, or territories, in case the ship or goods be there seized; and the other third part to him that shall seize, inform, or sue for the same, in any court of record, by bill, information, plaint, or action, wherein no essoin, protection, or wager of law shall be allowed. And all captains or commanders at sea, by commission from the king, or his successors, are required to bring in all ships or vessels so offending, and deliver them into the court of admiralty, there to be proceeded against; and in case of condemnation, one moiety is to be divided to the use of the admiral and commander, and their companies, according to the rules in case of a prize; and the other to the king and his successors. With many other clauses and provisos, tending much to the advancement of the English manufacture.

After an interval of near two months, the parliament re-assembled, and resumed the consideration of public affairs. They established the post-office, wine-licences, and other branches of the revenue; they continued the assessment of seventy thousand pounds per month, for paying the arrears of the army. Business being conducted with great unanimity, as soon as finished, and after a session of near ten months, the king, in a speech full of the most gracious expressions, thought proper to dissolve them on the twenty-ninth of December.

The confidence the people had in the king, from the extraordinary good opinion they had been prepossessed with in his favour, and their transports of joy at being delivered from the late confusions and distractions by means of his restoration, will account for the excessive complaisance that was shewn to the court, at the beginning of this great event, so that the parliament could scarce deny the king any thing: we wish that a regard to truth would permit us to conceal, that the ill use made of this confidence was the great cause of the opposition that was afterwards made to the court.

Sir Edward Hyde, whom the king had lately created earl of Clarendon, was generally considered as his majesty's chief counsellor; and so long as the advice of that able statesman was followed, the conduct of Charles, in most respects, may be said to be unexceptionable. He now applied himself to the paying and disbanding the army. When he reviewed these veteran troops, he was charmed with their beauty, order, discipline, and martial appearance; and thinking, as was too natural, that regular forces were a necessary implement of royalty, he expressed a desire of still retaining them in his service. But the chancellor set before him the dangerous consequences of such a measure. All the forces, therefore, were immediately disbanded, except a few guards and garrisons, amounting to a thousand foot. This was the first appearance, under the monarchy, of a regular standing army in England. The fortifications of Gloucester, Taunton, and some other towns, which had opposed the king during the civil wars, were likewise diminished.

Clarendon was now closely connected with the royal family. His daughter Anne Hyde, a woman of great beauty and spirit, had hearkened, while abroad, to the addresses of the duke of York, and, under promise of marriage, had indulged him in the privileges of a husband. Her pregnancy appeared soon after the Restoration; and though the duke seemed unwilling to contract so unequal an alliance, the king, in pity to his friend and minister, who had been totally unacquainted with these engagements, compelled his brother to espouse her. Clarendon expressed great uneasiness at the honour which had been bestowed upon him; and frequently said, that, by being raised so much above his rank, he thence apprehended a more terrible downfall*.

Of all the manifold sects and separations that sprung up from the licentiousness and anarchy that prevailed during the late civil war, there were scarce any that dreaded not the name of monarchy, as apprehending the consequence thereof to tend to uniformity in church and state. It is not therefore to be wondered at, that they who had set themselves up as professed enemies to the king and his right of government, should, after his coming in, be agitated with a restless spirit of impatience and disaffection, which was ever and anon breaking forth in such attempts as, had not a timely stop been put to them, by the prudent and vigilant care of his majesty and his council, might have embroiled the nation in a new civil war. The first alarm was given by the fifth-monarchy-men, a set of people, however so called, the most inveterate enemies to the ancient settled monarchy of the nation, of all the whole Hydra. Of these, about fifty or sixty wretches broke forth into open hostility, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, a cooper, a frantic enthusiast, who had often attempted the life of Cromwell. That which first gave him and his followers a pretence for their treason, was the oath of allegiance and supremacy, which they loudly exclaimed against, as also against all oaths in general. The madness of these men went so far as to expect the personal reign of Christ upon earth; they believed that they and the rest of their sect were called by God to reform the world, and make all the earthly powers (which they termed Babylon) subservient to the kingdom of king Jesus; and in order thereunto they were never to sheathe the sword till the carnal powers of the world became a hissing and a curse; and in the frenzy of their zeal they taught and believed, that one of them was alone sufficient to subdue ten thousand of their adversaries; and had very gravely planned, after having led captivity captive in England, to march into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world, there to prosecute their holy design.

On Sunday the sixth of January, 1661, they sallied forth, in number about sixty persons, completely armed, from their meeting in Coleman-street, and first marched to St. Thomas Apostle's, to call some of their party, and from thence to Bishopsgate, and afterwards to White-cross-street.

Sir Richard Brown, the lord-mayor, having notice of their being abroad, got together some files of the trained bands, but not sufficient, as was supposed, to make any impression upon them, they being imagined more numerous than they were; by which means they escaped to St. John's Wood, and from thence to Cane Wood, between Highgate and Hampstead.

By this time the alarm being come to Whitehall, and the general's regiment drawn up, the duke of York and he, with the earl of Oxford and some others, and a detachment of the guards, marched into London, where they were informed the rebels were dispersed, except a party that was seen to go towards Cane Wood, whither sir Thomas Sandys was sent, with a party of the guards and a company of foot; but, by the darkness of the night, they got away: and on the Wednesday morning came again into the city, and divided themselves into two parties, one whereof, about five or six in the morning, appeared about Leadenhall, and from thence marched to Little Eastcheap, where they fought obstinately enough, but were dispersed by the trained bands. Venner and another party came to my lord mayor's house, thinking to have taken him prisoner; but missing him, they marched into Woodstreet, where they were met by colonel Cor-bet, and about twenty horse. Corbet and nine of his party charged through the rebels and broke them, whereby the trained band foot had little more to do than to pursue them. They fought with courage to admiration; and if they had not been hindered by the care of the lord-mayor from increasing their numbers, a thousand men so resolved might have caused such a disturbance in the city, as might have had an influence much further. Venner himself was very much wounded before he was taken, and about five or six killed that refused quarter; of which some of them were so obscure, that their names were not known: and about eight or ten days after, Venner, with about sixteen or seventeen of the most notorious, were arraigned at Justice-hall in the Old Bailey, found guilty, and executed in several parts of London. This insurrection served as an handle to the court to suppress the presbyterians, and all other sects, who were begun to be confounded under the general name of Dissenters and Nonconformists.

Measures had been taken last year to suppress the kirk party in Scotland, and this year episcopacy was restored in that kingdom, and the parliament there, wholly devoted to the court, abrogated the solemn league and covenant, the idol of the majority of the Scottish nation, and made several acts in favour of the king's prerogative, and against the presbyterians. Sharpe, who was deputed by that body to manage their affairs in England, was persuaded to abandon their party; and as a reward for his compliance, was created archbishop of St. Andrews. The conduct of ecclesiastical affairs was committed to him; and as he was esteemed a traitor and apostate by his old friends, he became on that account, as well as from the violence of his measures, extremely odious to the nation. As Charles, in his declaration from Breda, had not come under any engagements to the Scots, he resolved, very ungenerously, to take advantage of that circumstance, and to wreak his vengeance on some of those whom he supposed to be the principal authors of the late commotions. The marquis of Argyle, and one Guthrie, a minister, were the unhappy victims.

The presbyterians, finding themselves confounded with other sectaries whom they mortally hated, desired a conference with some of the episcopal persuasion, in order, if possible, to effect a thorough accommodation. A conference was accordingly opened on March 25, 1661, in the Savoy, between twelve bishops, and as many leaders among the presbyterians; and great hopes were entertained, that some scheme might be devised which would finally give contentment to both parties; but this conference had the fate usual with most conferences of the like nature: it came to nothing, both parties being too rigidly tenacious of their own way and opinions not to say that the party, which soever it be, that is uppermost, has seldom a sincere desire of a coalition.

On the 23d of April, being St. George's day, the ceremony of his majesty's coronation was performed with great solemnity in Westminster-abbey; on which occasion he created sixty-eight knights of the Bath, six earls, and as many barons.

Writs had been issued for a new parliament to meet on the 8th of May, and the court had influenced the elections so successfully, that the majority of the members returned were strongly attached to the hierarchy and the royal prerogative. The king, in his first speech to both houses, recommended two bills for confirming the act of indemnity, and made them acquainted with his intention to espouse Donna Catharina, Infanta of Portugal, a match already concluded with the advice of his council.

The commons having chosen Sir Edward Turner, solicitor to the duke of York, speaker, immediately proceeded to business. They passed an act for security of the king's person and government: 1. Making it treason during the life of his present majesty, to intend or devise the king's imprisonment, bodily harm, or dethronement, or to make war against him. 2. To call him a papist or heretic, or to endeavour by speech or writing to deprive him of the affection of his subjects, was declared to incapacitate the person so offending, from enjoying any employment in church or state. 3. To maintain the indissoluble authority of the long parliament, or to affirm that either or both houses, without the king, are possessed of a legislative power, or that the covenant is obligatory, subjected the offender to the penalty of a premunire. The covenant itself, together with the act for erecting the high court of justice that sat on the late king and his friends; as also that for signing the engagement, and that for converting England into a commonwealth, were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the hangman. The custom of petitioning having been so much abused in the course of the former reign, it was now decreed that no more than twenty hands should be subscribed to any petition, without the authority of three justices, or the majority of the grand jury; and that no petition should be presented to the king, or either house, by above twenty persons. The violation of this law subjected the delinquent to a fine of an hundred pounds, and three months imprisonment.

On July 30, the king gave his assent to the above bills, as also to an act for restoring the bishops to their seats in the house of peers; and to another, declaring the sole right of the militia to be vested in the king; and then his majesty permitted the two houses to adjourn to the 20th of November, after they had thus restored monarchy and episcopacy to their full splendor, which were now exalted to as great an height as they had ever before aspired. This parliament was afterwards called the "pensionary parliament," because it was known that many of the members had pensions from the king. How agreeable the proceedings of the parliament were to the court, appears by its long continuance, which was almost eighteen years.

The two houses meeting according to their adjournment, on the 20th of November, petitioned the king to issue a proclamation, commanding all reduced officers and soldiers to retire to the distance of twenty miles from London; then the commons voted 1,200,000 l. for his majesty's present occasions.

Charles, though perfectly indifferent to all forms of religion, had been so rudely treated by the Scottish ecclesiastics, that he ever after entertained a violent prejudice against those of their character and opinions. He was often heard to say, that presbyterianism was not a religion fit for a gentleman. Not only the king, but the members of both both houses, and especially the earl of Clarendon, hated the presbyterians, and wanted an opportunity to humble them, under the general term of nonconformists. With this view the earl of Clarendon, in a conference between the two houses, positively affirmed that a conspiracy had been formed since the month of March, to interrupt the peace of the nation. He named several persons concerned in the plot, the particular circumstances of which he explained; and said, that although it had been defeated at London by the precaution taken with regard to the disbanded officers and soldiers, it would nevertheless be prosecuted in different counties of England. The two houses immediately appointed a committee to enquire into the affair, that measures might be taken to secure the peace of the kingdom. This pretended discovery was the foundation of the corporation act, which was now passed in parliament, ordaining all mayors, aldermen, counsellors, or officers of all corporations, to take an oath, importing, that they did not think it as lawful, on any pretence whatever, to take arms against the king; and that they abhorred the detestable maxim of arming against the king's person, under shadow of his authority, or even by opposing such as acted by virtue of his commission. This was a most scandalous concession, by which the liberties of England were left at the mercy of regal power. The committee of both houses proceeded on their enquiry into the nature of the conspiracy, and the earl of Clarendon made an alarming report of a design to surprize Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Bristol. But this plot seems to have been no other than a fiction of the ministry to pave the way for the act of uniformity; for that was no sooner passed than the inquiry was laid aside.

Elizabeth, electress-palatine, and queen of Bohemia, the king's aunt, and daughter of king James I. who resided in England, died at London on the 13th of February, 1661-2. She had eight sons and five daughters, of whom the youngest surviving, the princess Sophia, mother of king George I. was declared heir to the crown of Great Britain in 1701.

On the seventeenth of May, 1662, the king gave his assent to the act for establishing uniformity in the public worship, and in the administration of sacraments. By this statute, which began to be in force on St. Bartholomew's day, every minister was obliged to conform to the worship of the English church, according to the book of Common-prayer, lately revised, and to sign a declaration approving of that ritual, to take the oath of canonical obedience, abjure the solemn league and covenant, and acknowledge his detestation of the principle of taking up arms against the king, or those acting under his commission, on any pretence whatsoever. He was likewise restrained from administering the sacraments, unless he had been previously ordained by the bishop. By an act regulating the militia, all lords-lieutenants of counties, and their deputies, together with officers and soldiers, were obliged to declare upon oath, that they held it unlawful to take arms against the king, and those acting by his commission. As another instance of the parliament's devotion to the king, the commons voted an annual tax of two shillings upon every hearth to his majesty and his successors. This imposition, joined to the tonnage and poundage, the excise, and duty upon merchandize, augmented his revenue to a much greater sum than had ever been paid to any of his predecessors.

In consequence of the act of uniformity, about two thousand ministers, mostly presbyterians, but some of other parties, for refusing to conform to the said act, were obliged to quit their livings in the church. These and some other acts being passed, the parliament was prorogued to February 13, 1662-3.

Before the end of the session, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was affianced, and who landed in the beginning of May at Portsmouth, where the king met her, and the marriage was solemnized. The queen-mother, who left England the year before, now came over to assist at the nuptial ceremonies, and after a stay of three years in England, returned again to France.

Charles's prodigality always kept him in want, notwithstanding the supplies granted him far exceeded any thing that had been given by parliament to queen Elizabeth. His necessities put him upon a measure which has exposed him to much censure, and is regarded as one of the greatest blemishes of his reign, I mean the sale of Dunkirk to the French. Clarendon and Southampton, tho' virtuous ministers, were both concerned in this transaction; but in all probability the expedient was proposed by Charles himself. The chancellor invited d'Estrades, the French minister at the Hague, to come over to London, which he did soon after the king's marriage, and negotiated his affairs; and the French king purchased Dunkirk, with all the artillery and ammunition in the place, for the consideration of five millions of livres, or four hundred thousand pounds sterling.

We have already observed that Charles, during his exile, especially while at the court of France, had been prevailed on to adopt the religion of the church of Rome, at least in such a degree as a man of his latitudinarian principles can be said to adopt any religion: his brother the duke of York, of whom he was extremely fond, and who indeed directed almost all his actions, was an absolute bigot in popery, and as such could not fail to be alarmed at the late act of uniformity, which, though designed by the court to persecute the presbyterians, was found to bear equally hard upon every dissenter from the church of England. James and his party therefore exerted all their endeavours to weaken the force of this act. It was now pretended that great danger was to be apprehended to the state, from so numerous a body as the dissenters connected together; and that there was a necessity of granting toleration to all nonconformists, in which the papists were consequently to be included. The king readily adopted his brother's views, and in the month of January 1662-3, published a declaration under pretence of favouring the presbyterians, by dispensing with their compliance with some articles in the act of Uniformity: but though in this declaration the king alledged in excuse his solemn promises (in his declaration from Breda) of granting toleration to his subjects, and advanced several other specious topics, the parliament, who strongly suspected that he had another, and a deeper design in view, determined to defeat the measure.

The avowed design of gratifying the dissenters, and the secret resolution of supporting the catholics, were equally disagreeable to them; and in these sentiments they were confirmed by the lord-chancellor Clarendon, without whose privity and concurrence this declaration had been issued, and who, as he hated the presbyterians, was no friend to the papists, and therefore from this time began to sink in his credit at court.

The parliament assembling on February 18, drew up a remonstrance against the late declaration of indulgence, which they presented to his majesty, and both houses joined in desiring him to issue out a proclamation against all popish priests and jesuits. To this request the king returned a very obliging answer; but in the proclamation afterwards issued, the terms were so artfully couched, as to render it of little or no effect*. This seeming compliance of the king, however deceitful, passed so well with the parliament, that upon his application they voted him a supply of four subsidies, and this was the last time that taxes were raised in this manner.

The opposition the lord-chancellor had made to the plan of toleration, had exposed him to all the hatred of the duke of York and the popish party, and all means were devised to get rid of him. Digby, earl of Bristol, who had, during his residence abroad, embraced the catholic religion; and as most converts are, was a great bigot to his new faith, undertook to attack this enemy of the holy mother-church. Clarendon and he had, during the exclusion of the royal party, been upon terms of intimate friendship; but the chancellor having refused his assent to certain grants which Bristol had solicited for a court lady; this affront, as it was deemed by the latter nobleman, added to the motives of religion above-mentioned, determined him to attack the minister in the most violent manner; and on the tenth of July, 1663, he openly impeached him of high-treason before the house of peers; but the apparent malice of the charge, from the almost total deficiency of proofs to support it, occasioned the lords to throw it out with indignation; and Bristol himself was so ashamed of what he had done, that he went abroad, where he remained for some time. On the twenty-seventh of July, the parliament, after having settled the revenues of the post-office and wine-licence on the duke of York, was prorogued to the following spring†.

Gratitude was not one of Charles's shining virtues. The royalists, who had ventured so much, and suffered so deeply in his service, were after his restoration wholly neglected by him. When applications were made to him on this head, he used to answer, that those who were truly his friends would still remain so; and that if he was to bestow favour, it should be on his enemies, in order to win them over to his service. His parliament had more generosity. They took some notice of the poor cavaliers, and at one time distributed among them about sixty thousand pounds.

Mrs. Lane likewise and the Pendrells had handsome presents and pensions assigned them for the great service they had been of, in preserving the king's person after the battle of Worcester.

Ever since the Restoration, the government had at different times been alarmed with the rumour of plots carrying on by the republicans; and this year one was discovered, which was said to be for a general insurrection; it was an idle scheme of some inconsiderable fanatics and disbanded soldiers, thirty of whom were taken and executed. It served Charles, however, as a pretext to demand of the parliament, when it next met again on the sixteenth of March, 1664, a repeal of the act for triennial parliaments, affirming that the kingdom was exposed to continual troubles, from the suggestions of a set of men, who gave out that this parliament was dissolved by virtue of that act. The parliament, who still continued to adhere to the principles of exalting monarchy, even beyond the bounds of reason and moderation, readily complied with the royal request. The act was repealed, and thus all the securities which the subject had against the illegal extension of court influence, were dissipated by a breath; and Charles failed not to make his own advantage of these concessions to shorten difficulties, and baffle opposition.

This parliament was not more servile in its compliance with the king, than it was rigorous and uncharitable with regard to its fellow-subjects; the true spirit of persecution seemed to actuate all its deliberations in religious matters; it seemed to forget that the like rigid maxims of intolerance adopted by Laud, had been one cause of the dreadful calamities from which the nation had been so lately delivered; for now, as if the penalties denounced in the act of Uniformity against dissenters of all denominations, were not sufficient, in May 1664, the famous Conventicle Act was passed, whereby it was enacted, that if any one should repair to conventicles (as the meetings of the nonconformists to religious worship were called) the first offence was to be punished with a fine of five pounds, or three months imprisonment, and ten pounds for a peer; the second offence ten pounds and six months imprisonment, and twenty pounds for a peer: but for the third offence, after a trial by a jury of the peers, according to the quality of the offender, the party convicted was to be transported to some foreign plantation, unless he commuted by the payment of one hundred pounds.

There was about this time a dispute between our court and the states of the United Provinces, in relation to commerce; and the royal African company in particular had been opposed by the Dutch, in establishing their settlements on the coast of Guinea. In the preceding year, sir Robert Holmes had been sent from England with a fleet of twenty-two ships to the coast of Africa, to protect our merchants and traders there, and expel the Dutch from some places they had seized

* The parliament had agreed, that all foreign priests belonging to the two queens should be excepted, and allowed without molestation to continue in England. In the proclamation, the word "foreign" was purposely left out; and the queens were, by that means, intitled to grant protection to as many English priests as they pleased. Burnet. Hume.

† In the course of this session, several laws were enacted relating to trade. Some rules were likewise established for putting the militia into better order; and it was decreed, that the king should not have the power of keeping them under arms above fourteen days in the year. See stat. 15 & 16 Car. II.

against the faith of treaties. Holmes executed his commission with equal spirit and success, after taking from the Dutch Cape Verd and the island of Goree, together with several of their trading ships on that coast; and sailing to America, he made himself master of Nova Belgia, since known by the name of New-York, which had never been occupied by any but the Hollanders. The Dutch warmly remonstrated against these hostilities, but receiving no real satisfaction, they resolved to employ force against force, and dispatched de Ruyter, one of their admirals, to the coast of Guinea, who in a short time re-established the Dutch in possession of those settlements of which they had been deprived, except Cape Corse. He afterwards attacked Barbadoes, but without success. These acts, which were so many preludes to a rupture between the two nations, were by no means displeasing to Charles, whose growing necessities, the natural consequences of a blind prodigality, made him glad of any pretext to draw money from his parliament. The disposition of this latter, indeed, was as favourable to this design as the king could wish; for the commons having taken the state of the national trade into consideration, they voted, "That the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities offered to the English by the subjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of these kingdoms: that his majesty should be humbly requested to demand and obtain reparation for those damages; and that in the prosecution of this affair, the house would assist him with their lives and fortunes against all oppositions whatsoever." This vote was deemed a sufficient sanction for those vigorous measures which the court had now proposed to adopt, and the parliament was prorogued till the month of November.

In the mean time, the naval preparations were carried on with uncommon diligence: the whole nation seemed to be inspired with jealousy and animosity against the Dutch. The parliament having as yet granted no supplies, the city of London lent the king one hundred thousand pounds, that no stop might be made to the armament. Charles himself visited the arsenals and magazines in person, and in a short time the English navy was put in a very formidable condition. Admiral Lawson was sent out in September, with orders to seize all Dutch ships he met with on his cruise; in which he had so much success, that in a short time one hundred and thirty-five of their merchant ships fell into the hands of the English; and the parliament meeting again on the twenty-fourth of November, granted two millions five hundred thousand pounds for carrying on the intended war, the largest supply by far that had been granted to any English monarch*.

The king having had his hands thus strengthened by his parliament, declared war against the States in the month of March, 1665, after having prorogued the parliament to August, and afterwards to October. In this session the clergy gave up their right of taxing themselves in convocation, and have ever since been taxed by the parliament in common with other subjects: from this time, indeed, the clergy had votes at elections for members of parliament, but, by parting with their importance as a distinct body of the state, they have been held in very little public consideration since.

The Dutch, alarmed at the great preparations making in England against them, had, towards the close of the last year, sent over an embassy, to endeavour if possible to compromise the quarrel in an amicable manner; but seeing all their application slighted, they set about all the necessary preparations for a vigorous defence: in the mean time they earnestly importuned Lewis XIV. of France, who being then of age, and having taken the reins of government into his own hands, began to be considered as a warlike and politic prince, to declare against England, in consequence of the last treaty concluded between the crown of France and the States General. Lewis was at the same time as warmly pressed by Charles to observe a strict neutrality. In this conjuncture the French monarch was greatly divided in his sentiments: he wished to keep fair with Charles, lest the latter should throw himself into the arms of Spain; and on the other hand, it was his interest to support the de Wit and Louvestein party in Holland, against the prince of Orange, who naturally claimed the assistance of his uncle the king of England: in order to gain time, he sent the duke de Verneuil at the head of a splendid embassy to London, with offers of mediating a peace between England and Holland; but, after a stay of several months, that nobleman's endeavours proved fruitless.

The man who at this time directed all the measures of the Dutch republic, and infused spirit into that phlegmatic community, was the famous John de Wit, a minister equally distinguished for greatness of mind, for extent of capacity, and for integrity of manners: though modest in his private behaviour, he well knew how to support in his public conduct that magnanimity which becomes the minister of a great state. It was always his opinion, that no independent government should ever make any mean or unreasonable concessions to another; and that all such compliances, instead of preventing war, served only to invite farther insults and indignities. By his management a spirit of harmony was preserved in all the provinces; great sums were raised, and a navy was prepared, consisting of larger ships than any which the Dutch had ever built before, and able to contend with the fleet of England*.

The English navy was already on so respectable a footing, that, by the eighteenth of May this year, the duke of York set sail with a fleet of one hundred and fourteen sail, exclusive of fire-ships and bomb-ketches, having under him prince Rupert and the gallant earl of Sandwich: this noble armament carried on board about twenty-two thousand men. On the other hand, the provinces of Zealand and Holland having joined their squadrons, they composed a fleet of one hundred and twenty ships of war, besides fire-ships, of which the command was given to Opdam, an experienced sea-officer, and of an undaunted courage, who had orders to seize the first opportunity of giving battle to the enemy.

It was not long before the two fleets met, and on the third of June a remarkable engagement was fought between them, when the Dutch were beaten, having lost a great many of their ships, though the number is variously related; according to the lowest account they were about twenty: Opdam himself was blown up, together with his ship and all the men on board. The English lost but four ships; but several persons of distinction were killed. A day of thanksgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and several medals were struck in honour of the duke of York: it is indeed confessed on all hands, that the duke displayed great courage and conduct during the whole engagement, being all the time engaged in the hottest of the fight, and exposing himself like a common man.

Terror and dismay seized on the Dutch, when they received the news of this defeat; and it required all the abilities and constancy of de Wit to revive the spirits of his drooping countrymen: he repaired in person on board their fleet, and quickly rectified all the disorders occasioned by the late misfortune. In the mean time the Dutch fleet of merchant ships from Turkey and the East Indies, having sailed north-about in order to avoid the English cruizers, anchored in the port of Bergen, in Norway, where they lay till de Ruyter should come and convoy them to Holland. Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English envoy at Copenhagen, proposed to the king of Denmark, that he should seize all those ships, which were richly laden, by way of revenge upon the Dutch, who, he said, had involved his Danish majesty in a troublesome war with Sweden. The king was tempted by the richness of the prize, but observed he was not in a condition to execute such a design: Talbot promised to procure the assistance of the English fleet, provided he would recompense the captors with one half of what they should take; the bargain was struck between the two monarchs, and Charles ordered the earl of Sandwich to sail immediately to Bergen. The earl detached sir Thomas Tiddeman with part of the fleet on that service, and he attacked the Dutch with great impetuosity; but the governor of Bergen, who had not yet received orders to remain passive, joined the Hollanders in giving him such a warm reception, that he was obliged to quit the enterprise, after having received considerable damage. Charles was not a little chagrined at this disappointment; and so displeased with the earl of Sandwich for having omitted to sail thither in person, that he was deprived of his command, and sent on an embassy to Madrid.

While these affairs were transacting abroad, the city of London was groaning beneath the most dreadful scourge of the plague, which broke out in the beginning of May this year, and in the space of eleven months that it continued to rage, swept away in that single city upwards of one hundred thousand souls: the king, on its first appearance, withdrew to Hampton-court, but afterwards, to be at a greater distance, removed to Salisbury.

The parliament, agreeable to its prorogation, assembled on the ninth of October, but held its sessions at Oxford, on account of the plague, which, though it still continued to depopulate the capital, did not so much affect the other part of the kingdom. The king having represented to them in his speech, that the supply of two millions and an half, granted him towards the maintenance of the war, was nearly expended in fitting out the fleet, and paying some foreign powers, especially the warlike bishop of Munster (Bernard Van Galen) for making a diversion upon the frontiers of the states; the commons, who appear to have been very zealous for the vigorous continuation of the war, quickly voted a second supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds for that purpose, and at the same time made a present to the duke of York of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, as a reward for his eminent services in the late sea engagement with the Dutch. The independants, anabaptists, and republicans, had this year formed a design for an insurrection, having been encouraged thereto by emissaries from the Dutch; but all their projects had proved abortive. However, this furnished the king and court, who naturally hated the presbyterians, with a handle to bring them in under the general denomination of non-conformists, from whom the church and nation was represented to be in the utmost danger; tho' we cannot find any authority to charge the former with having been any way concerned in the practices or designs of the other fanatic sects. Be that as it may, a bill was brought into the house this session, and was passed without any difficulty; by which it was enacted, "That no nonconformist teacher, under what denomination soever, shall dwell or come, unless upon the road, within five miles of any corporation, or any other place where they had been ministers, or had preached after the act of oblivion, unless they first took the following oath: "I do swear that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the king, and that I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him in pursuance of such commissions: and that I will not at any time endeavour any alteration of government, either in church or state."

This act has since been famous, under the name of The Five Mile Act; and the penalty denounced against every offender was forty pounds and six months imprisonment. It would not be doing justice to the character of the earl of Clarendon and his great friend the earl of Southampton, both of them the warmest adversaries of the presbyterians, if we did not observe, that the rigor of this act seemed so unjustifiable to them, that when it came into the house of lords, they opposed it with all their might. Nevertheless, it got through that house, and the king gave it the royal assent on the thirty-first of October, as he did at the same time to the money-bill, and some others; after which he prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of February, 1665-6.

This same year the council of Scotland discovered no less heat and animosity against the presbyterians, on pretence of some insolence committed by a private minister, named Alexander Smith. A proclamation was published the twenty-fourth of December, ordering that all the silenced presbyterian ministers should, within forty days, remove themselves and their families from the places where they had been ministers, and that they should not reside within twenty miles of the same, or within six miles of Edinburgh, or any cathedral church, or within three miles of any royal borough, nor should be more than two together in the same parish, on pain of incurring the penalties of the law against movers of sedition. Every man of a charitable disposition must confess, that this was a most cruel and unjustifiable rigor, especially when when we reflect that the presbyterians composed the bulk of the Scottish nation.* The times were however now so thoroughly changed, that the very people who thought the shadow of royalty too great a concession to grant their prince in the last reign, now thought no sacrifice too great to be made to his will. The ill effects of such a proceeding manifested themselves shortly after, in an insurrection of the sufferers; but their numbers being inconsiderable (not exceeding fifteen hundred) they were soon defeated, three hundred being killed on the spot, and about one hundred taken prisoners, who were most of them executed.

By this time France had openly espoused the cause of the Dutch, and resolved to assist them with the utmost vigour. Lewis had ordered the duke of Beaufort, his admiral, to set sail from Toulon with the French squadron, of above forty sail, under his command. The ambassadors of France were recalled out of England; and on the nineteenth of January, 1665-6, Lewis published a declaration of war against us. The States likewise found means to gain over the king of Denmark, by an engagement to pay him yearly, during the continuance of the war, one million five hundred thousand florins; for which he on his part engaged to keep a fleet of thirty sail of ships of war for their service. They likewise raised so many enemies against the bishop of Munster, that he quickly found himself under a necessity to disband his forces, and make peace on the best terms he could obtain. The Dutch were wholly indebted for these favourable events to their pensionary de Wit, who discharged his trust with equal care and ability. The utmost assiduity was employed in repairing their late loss by sea; and early in the spring the States had a well-manned fleet of seventy sail ready for sea. De Ruyter, their great admiral, returned from his expedition to Guinea, took the command of this fleet, and had under him, as second in command, the famous Van Tromp.

The plague having ceased its ravages, Charles returned to London in the month of February, and immediately declared war against France. The command of the English fleet, consisting of seventy-four sail, was given to Monk, duke of Albemarle, and prince Rupert, who put to sea towards the end of May, 1666. Albemarle, who from the repeated defeats of the Dutch under the protectorship, had rashly entertained too despicable an opinion of their courage, resolved to detach prince Rupert, in order to intercept the French fleet, under the duke of Beaufort, who, it was said, was now in the Channel, waiting to join the Dutch upon their putting to sea, which they did: for after our fleet sailed, those who were acquainted with the courage and conduct of de Ruyter, remonstrated against this division of our force; but the duke of Albemarle continued obstinate in his resolution. The event shewed how unreasonably he had given his orders.

The fleet of the States, commanded by de Ruyter, was come to an anchor between Newport and Dunkirk. Thither Albemarle, with those ships he had retained with him, immediately sailed, to compel the enemy to an action; who, on their side, upon his coming in sight, cut their cables, to be in the greater readiness to receive him. The battle which followed is one of the most remarkable that occurs in history, whether we consider the length of its duration, or the obstinacy with which it was fought. It would be equally tedious and uninteresting to relate every particular of this action, which began on the first of June, in the forenoon, and lasted, with very little intermission, for four days, with astonishing valour on both sides. In the course of the action, the Dutch were reinforced by sixteen fresh ships. The English had suffered so severely, that their fighting ships were reduced to twenty-eight, and they found it necessary to retire towards their own coasts; which the Dutch perceiving, exerted all their efforts to cut off their retreat, and would probably have succeeded, had it not been for the fortunate junction of prince Rupert, who, after cruising the Channel in vain in search of the French squadron, who indeed had not yet entered it, now appeared in sight to the southward, advancing in full sail towards the scene of action, and about the evening (of the third day) fell into his station, astern the Dutch division. The next morning Albemarle returned to the fight, which now became more furious than ever. Ship grappled ship, and the men fought hand to hand, as if on firm ground. A thick mist at length put an end to the conflict; under the favour of which Albemarle with his fleet sailed for the mouth of the Thames, leaving the watery field to de Ruyter and the Dutch.

In these four days of battle, the English lost twenty-three capital ships, besides several others of less note; six thousand men killed, and two thousand six hundred made prisoners. Amongst the slain were sir William Berkley, vice-admiral of the white squadron, and sir Christopher Mims: sir George Ayscue, in a ship of an hundred guns, the largest in the fleet, ran aground; and his countrymen not being able to afford him any assistance, he was compelled to yield to the enemy. The loss of the Dutch amounted to six ships, two thousand eight hundred and eighty men, besides the admirals Evertzen Van der Holst, and Strekhoven, with some other officers. Though the English retired first to their harbours, and tho' it was generally believed by our officers and men who survived, that their whole fleet might have been taken, sunk, or burnt, if it had not been for prince Rupert's coming up as he did, yet we claimed the victory. The great pensionary de Wit was on board the Dutch fleet, and is said to have invented chain-shot* on this occasion, which did incredible damage to the rigging of our ships, and contributed not a little to the advantage the Dutch gained over us.

The two fleets were not long before they put to sea again; for Beaufort, the French admiral, being now ready to enter the Channel, and join his allies, de Ruyter, after having refitted his ships, sailed from the Texel, and posted himself at the mouth of the river Thames, with a view to block up our fleet in the harbour. Such an insult was not to be brooked by Englishmen; and therefore Albemarle and prince Rupert hastened out to attack him. The English fleet, now reinforced, consisted of an hundred sail: that of the Hollanders amounted to eighty-eight ships of the line, besides nineteen fire-ships. They met on the twenty-fourth of July, and the fight soon began with incredible fury, and was as obstinately disputed. At length the Dutch were beaten with considerable loss; and it was chiefly by the bravery and conduct of de Ruyter that the Dutch were brought into their ports. De Ruyter, on his return to Holland, made great complaints of Van Tromp's conduct, who was thereupon put under arrest, and dismissed from his post. It seems he had attacked sir Jeremy Smith, who commanded the blue squadron of the English fleet, and put that division to rout; but pursuing the flying enemy too far, had never been able to rejoin his own fleet, and was very near being taken with all his ships.

Albemarle finding himself master of the sea by the retreat of the Dutch fleet, detached admiral Holmes with twenty ships of war, to inspect the coast of Holland; and that commander entering the road of Vlie, destroyed an hundred and forty merchant vessels, and two ships of war; after which he burnt Brarisdon, a large and rich village on the coast. The French admiral, who was by this time in full sail to join the Dutch upon the coast of England, received the news of its defeat, and that the ships were returned into port; whereupon he himself retired to Brest with all expedition, having had the good fortune to escape the vigilance of the English, who waited for him off the Isle of Wight. One French ship alone, the Ruby, was taken by our fleet.

On the second of September this year, about one in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out in the city of London; it began in a baker's house near the bridge, and diffused itself on all sides with such rapidity, that nothing could resist the progress of the flames. This dreadful conflagration lasted for three whole days; nor did it stop till it had laid the greatest part of the capital in ashes, consuming eighty churches, several of the city gates, and four hundred streets, containing thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling-houses. The ruins overspread a space of four hundred and twenty-six acres, from the Tower by Thames side to the Temple church, and from the north-east gate along the city-wall to Holborn-bridge; but though the fire was thus merciless to the estates and fortunes of the citizens, it was very favourable to their lives, few perishing on this occasion, in proportion to the extent of the calamity.

Various were the conjectures on the cause and authors of this fire, no one being inclined to think it casual. Numbers would have it to be brought about by the malice of the Republicans; but most ascribed it to the papists, according to the inscription upon the famous Monument, erected in memory of this dreadful conflagration. Each of these suspicions, however, seem to have had their rise in the violent animosities that possessed the minds of the different parties that swarmed at this period. Their posterity, who behold this and other events of their time through the cooler medium of reason, see no cause to ascribe this accident to treachery or malice. The streets of London were then extremely narrow; the houses were almost all built of timber, or of lath and plaister; the season was remarkably dry; and a violent east wind happened at that time to blow. To these causes, and to these only, the surprizing progress of the fire ought naturally to be ascribed*.

But not all the miseries his subjects had experienced from this dreadful accident and the preceding one of the plague, could make any impression on the mind of Charles, or divert him from the prosecution of the ruinous war he had engaged in. Accordingly the parliament having reassembled, after some prorogations, on the first of September, the king, in a speech to both houses, magnified the happy success of his arms, as if he had been always victorious; and concluded with assuring the commons, that the money granted for carrying on the war had proved deficient, and solicited a further supply. The commons still retaining their liberal disposition, freely voted him a supply of one million eight hundred thousand pounds; which, together with what they had already given him, amounted to four millions four hundred and sixty thousand pounds. Nevertheless, the commons mistrusting that the king was not so warmly attached to the protestant religion as they could wish, or he made professions to be, presented an address, praying that the laws against jesuits and popish priests might be put into execution, Charles, willing to shew them some complaisance in return for having filled his coffers, caused a proclamation to be issued for banishing all popish priests and jesuits out of the kingdom: but this proclamation, like those of his father and grandfather on the same subject, was shamefully eluded by the connivance of the king and court. This conduct more than ever convinced the people that the king had some secret attachment to popery, which he was either ashamed or afraid to own. Whether these suspicions had lessened the king's popularity, is uncertain; but it appears that the commons took very little notice about the dispatch of the money-bill, which was not finished till the close of the year, notwithstanding the king sent several messages to the house to quicken the business.

At last, on the eighteenth of January, 1667, a bill passed both houses for raising the above-mentioned sum of one million eight hundred thousand pounds, partly by a poll-tax, and partly by assessments; and about the middle of February, the king gave his assent to this and several other acts, promising at the same time that the money granted him should be wholly applied to the use it was intended for; then he prorogued the parliament to the tenth of October. Among the acts passed in this session, was one for rebuilding that part of the city demolished by fire, which was

* Though several suspected persons were taken up on this account, it was never possible to discover or prove that the baker's house, where this dreadful calamity first broke out, was fired on purpose. Nevertheless, a French Huguenot, a native of Roan, and a lunatic, having owned himself guilty of this horrible action, was condemned and executed: but it appeared afterwards, by the testimony of the master of the ship who brought him out of France, that though he was landed at the time of the fire, yet he did not arrive in London till two days after it began. It is pretended likewise that a Dutch boy, ten years old, had confessed that his father and himself had thrown fire-balls into the baker's house, through a window that stood open. But besides the objection that may be made to this testimony from the boy's age, there must have been some circumstance in this narrative not agreeable to the fact, since it was never thought proper to make further enquiry. Rapin.

finished with more expedition than could be expected. The king, by a stretch of prerogative, regulated the plans of the new streets, so as to render them more spacious and convenient than those which had been burned; and he prohibited the use of lath and timber, as the materials for the construction of houses. In consequence of this improvement, London became more healthy after the fire. The plague, which was wont to break out with great violence twice or thrice every century, and indeed was always lurking in some corner of the city, has entirely disappeared since that calamity.

Charles, notwithstanding the positive promises he had given on his part, no sooner found himself sure of a plentiful supply of money, than he became tired of the war, and bent his thoughts towards bringing about a peace. The Dutch had furnished him with a good pretence for this, by a letter which they had wrote him just before the breaking up of the parliament; to which he had returned no answer, as the money-bill was then depending; but that being now passed, Charles appeared more tractable. In fine, after several consultations, a conference was appointed to be opened at Breda, on the tenth of May 1667, and the several powers concerned sent thither their plenipotentiaries. Those from England were the lord Holles, and Mr. Henry Coventry. From France, the count d'Estades, and Mr. Courtin. From Denmark, Mr. Klengenbergh and Canisens; and from the States-General, Messieurs Beverriench, Hubert, and Yonstall. From the king of Sweden came as mediators, messieurs Fleming and Coyet; but the last dying at Breda soon after his arrival, the count de Dohna, the Swedish ambassador to the States, took his place. The conferences were however prolonged, by some punctilios which Charles insisted on, to save appearances with his people; because, how trifling soever, they were almost the only things particularly alleged as the cause of the war. Holles and Coventry proposed that a cessation of hostilities should be immediately concluded, till the several points in dispute could be happily concluded: but this proposal was rejected by de Wit: that sagacious and enterprising minister had formed a resolution of striking a blow which he thought would have a greater effect in favour of his countrymen, than all the arguments that could be used in the congress.

Being well informed that Charles, depending upon the success of the conference, and thinking that he had nothing to fear from the Dutch, had unmanned his fleet, and laid up all the large ships, in hopes of keeping to himself the greatest part of the money granted him by his parliament; he ordered de Ruyter to sail with a fleet of fifty ships, and surprize the English, lulled in their dangerous security. De Ruyter executed his commission with equal conduct and success. On the eighth of June he entered the mouth of the Thames, and filled the capital with terror and consternation. He then dispatched his vice-admiral, Van Ghent, with some ships into the river Medway, who, by the favour of a fresh easterly wind, broke the chain which defended the entrance of that harbour, and burnt three large ships, called the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all of them taken from the States this war. He also seized the hull of the Royal Charles, and then proceeding as far as Upnor castle, burned the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all capital ships. After which falling down the Medway again, he joined Ruyter, who lay still at the Nore. Nothing less was now expected in London than that the enemy, improving their success, would sail up the river Thames, and destroy all the merchant ships lying there, if not insult the city itself: wherefore thirteen ships were immediately sunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall; platforms of cannon were raised on the banks of the river, and every precaution taken to resist the threatened assault. But de Ruyter not chusing to run too great hazards, weighed anchor from the Nore; and sailing southward, made an attempt to destroy the shipping at Portsmouth and Plymouth; from both which places he was repulsed with some loss: then taking advantage of the wind, which seemed to veer about just as he wanted it, he came up the Channel again, and entered the Thames, advancing as far as Tilbury-fort: but he soon found the enemy too well prepared for his reception to hope for any success. He made the best of his way to sea again; but he kept the coast of England in continual alarms for near two months, that is, till he received the news of the conclusion of a peace, which was finally ratified about the latter end of July.

By this ratification Acadia was yielded to the French king, who agreed to restore St. Christophers, and some other islands which he had taken in the West Indies; and the two principal contracting parties retained the acquisitions they had made. The colony of New-York was the only advantage which the English derived from the war, that had cost the nation such an immense sum, and in which the folly, negligence, and avarice of their sovereign had been in a singular manner displayed to all Europe.

The late glaring insult, and the present inadequate peace, filled every English breast with grief and indignation, every mouth with complaints and reproaches. But Charles, as if born only for himself, being now freed from the troubles of the war, gave into every kind of licentiousness, regardless of the sufferings or cries of his people. His courtiers, following his example, seemed to vie with each other in libertinism and debauchery: irreligious wit and obscene raillery triumphed in broad day, while decency, virtue, and morality, were obliged to hide their head. There was but one person about the court, who by his noble and virtuous qualities, and his great authority, seemed to be a check upon the growing evil, and him they took care to remove out of the way. This was the great earl of Clarendon; the most discerning and upright magistrate; the most capable and faithful minister England had for a long time seen. The wide difference between his principles and practice, and those of the sovereign and his followers, quickly brought him into disgrace: but they did not dare openly to attack him, till they had first poisoned the minds of the people with base insinuations against him. The sale of Dunkirk, the bad payment of the seamen, nay, the disgrace at Chatham, and the shameful conclusion of the war, were by their emissaries imputed to the chancellor. The people, ever giddy and unthinking, and open to every prepossession, swallowed the bait provided for them. The earl of Clarendon was now become the most obnoxious of ministers in their eyes; and the parliament meeting on the tenth of October, the commons sent up an impeachment against him to the house of lords, in which almost the only article that could admit of any proof, was that of the sale of Dunkirk; but even this, the most exceptionable of all his counsels, was rather owing to a mistake in judgment, than to any malignity of intention. The peers, when the charge was presented to them, demurred for some time on the truth of the allegations preferred against the earl, and refused to order him into custody. This highly affronted the commons, and begot several conferences between the two houses. Clarendon in the mean time, seeing how he was pursued by the malice of his enemies, and knowing himself entirely given up by his sovereign, whom he had so long and so faithfully served, withdrew to Rouen in Normandy, where he lived under the protection of Lewis XIV. The French, more judicious and more humane than his own countrymen, knew the worth of the man, and received him with open arms and every mark of respect. This illustrious exile, who spent the rest of his days in an easy retirement, employed his leisure hours in composing that excellent history of the rebellion in England, which bears his name. He died at Rouen in 1674, leaving behind him the character of a nobleman of unblemished virtue, an incorruptible judge, and an able minister, equally valuable for his attachment and integrity.

Clarendon

Upon Clarendon's withdrawing out of the kingdom, the seals were given to sir Orlando Bridgeman, by the title of lord-keeper; and a bill passed both houses for banishing him, to which the king gave his assent on the eighteenth of December. A little before the disgrace of lord Clarendon, the king lost another, and his only other, faithful counsellor, an intimate friend of the chancellor's, namely, the earl of Southampton, lord-treasurer. After which the treasury was put into the hands of commissioners, one of whom was sir Richard Clifford, a declared papist; and sir Henry Bennet, created earl of Arlington, a disguised one, was made secretary of state. Southampton dead, and Clarendon removed out of the way, the court abandoned itself to debauchery, without restraint.

The duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of spirit and humour, but of a most vicious and abandoned life, and Wilmot earl of Rochester, a shining wit, the most lewd and licentious poet of his age, were the king's chief favourites, and the ministers of his pleasures. With these and his mistresses he spent almost his whole time. In short, none but papists and men of no religion had any credit at the court of Charles II. *

While our English monarch was thus giving a loose to pleasures that disgraced the exalted station he bore, Lewis XIV. was diligently pursuing the extensive designs he had formed. Philip IV. of Spain was lately dead. Lewis had, upon his marriage with the infanta of Spain, daughter to the deceased Philip, renounced all title of succession to any part of the Spanish monarchy; but no sooner was his father-in-law dead, than he retracted his renunciation, and now prepared to recover, by force of arms, what he called his natural rights to the Spanish Netherlands and the Franche Comté †. The States of the United Provinces, alarmed at the rapid progress of the French, and fearing it was only a prelude to an attack upon themselves, who lay so near to the danger; set themselves to concert with the courts of England and Sweden. That confederacy, which was afterwards so famous under the name of the Triple Alliance, in order to check the ambitious projects of the king of France. Charles, in listening to these overtures, and afterwards adopting the proposed union, took a step which is certainly worthy of praise, and is perhaps the only one during his whole reign that was any way conducive to the interest of England and of Europe; but he did not long continue in these prudent measures: and indeed we have but too many unquestionable authorities from the public and private history of his reign, to conclude, that his only design in adopting them, was only to amuse the public, and that there was a secret understanding between him and Lewis at the same time.

No sooner however was the peace concluded, than he ordered sir William Temple (one of the most able negotiators of his time) his minister at Brussels, to repair secretly to the Hague, and conclude the proposed league. This minister found means to persuade de Wit, the pensionary, to detach himself from the interests of France, and thereby put a stop to the encroachments she was daily making on the liberties of Europe. De Wit, who was equal in candour, generosity, and ability, to the English minister, readily gave his assent. I shall not enter into the particulars of the negotiation, which is to be met with in the writings of sir William Temple. I shall only observe, that by the address and the dexterity of this envoy, the treaty of alliance between the king of England and the States was concluded in five days, and that de Wit had the spirit, for the sake of public utility, to depart from the laws of the republic, and by his authority to persuade the States-General to sign and confirm the league in the beginning of the year 1668, without any communication of it to the particular provinces, which had never been practised before. Moreover, count

* In October this year, 1667, the king laid the first stone of the Royal Exchange, which was built in the room of the old one erected by sir Thomas Gresham. Abraham Cowley the poet, and Dr. Jeremy Taylor, bishop of Down and Connor in Ireland, died this year.

† This province, which borders upon Burgundy, is forty leagues long, and about twenty broad. It was called the Franche-Comté (or the free country) and was actually so; for the kings of Spain were rather its protectors than its masters: and though this country was in the government of Flanders, yet it was very little dependent on it. The administration was divided and disputed between the parliament and the governor of Franche-Comté. The people enjoyed many considerable privileges, which the court of Madrid were cautious of infringing, being desirous to keep fair with a province that was so jealous of its rights, and so near a neighbour to France. Never did people live under a milder government, or were more attached to their sovereign. They had preserved an affection to the house of Austria for near two generations: this affection proceeded from their love of liberty. In a word, Franche-Comté was happy, though poor; but as it was a kind of republic, there were necessarily some factions among its inhabitants, of which Lewis took his advantage; for notwithstanding what Pellisson says, the French king did not confine himself merely to force on this occasion. Volt. Age of Lewis XIV.

Dohna, the Swedish ambassador, engaged for his master that he should enter into the treaty; and soon after the king of Sweden sent his ratification in form. Shortly after, the same sir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the States-General, and about the same time a treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily effected under the guarantee of the king of England.

Charles, however, made the war against France the least part of his study; he sought only for means to draw an ample supply from his subjects. The new alliance, with which the whole kingdom was delighted, furnished him with the most plausible pretext. For this purpose, in his speech to the parliament, which met on the tenth of February, he boasted of the league he had concluded, as a master-stroke of politics, and an incontestible proof of his firm attachment to his allies. The commons took all he said for granted; and, overjoyed with the prospect of humbling the French monarch, they voted the king three hundred and ten thousand pounds, by an imposition on wine and other liquors.

Philip IV. of Spain had been succeeded by his son Charles the Second, then a minor, under the regency of the queen his mother. The court of Spain by no means approved of the Triple Alliance, as by some of the articles it had been determined to compel that power to make certain concessions to France, which were very disagreeable to the haughty spirit of the Spaniard, who declared himself ready to relinquish entirely the Low Countries, rather than agree to the terms imposed by the contracting powers; but Temple and de Wit were not to be deceived by this bravado: they still insisted on the terms of the Triple Alliance, and threatened Spain with war, in case of a refusal. Spain at last finding it in vain to resist, made choice of the alternative proposed; and as by the triple league the remaining provinces were guaranteed to her, and that she had lately concluded a peace on equal terms with Portugal, she thought herself in a condition to resist the future attempts of her proud and ambitious rival.

Though the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, which was signed on the second of May, 1668; and by which Spain and France were brought to make peace with each other, had considerably augmented the power of France, by giving it possession of the places it had conquered during the war; the States-General believed, nevertheless, that they had done a great thing in stopping the career of the French arms, and preventing their further progress. They ascribed to themselves the whole glory and merit of this success, though indeed the Triple Alliance had never come into their head, had it not been proposed by the king of England. To immortalize their glory, they struck a medal, on one side of which was seen Holland leaning against a trophy; and upon the reverse, words to this effect; "That they had restored and secured the laws; amended and reformed religion; assisted, defended, and reconciled kings; restored freedom to the ocean; procured by their arms a glorious peace; and established the tranquility of all Europe." On the other hand, Joshua Van Beuningen, who had been employed in negotiating this peace, struck a medal, and compared himself to Joshua stopping the course of the sun. As the king of France had taken the sun for his device, the meaning of this medal could not be mistaken. The French monarch was not a little incensed, that a pitiful state, like that of Holland, should have presumed to think of setting bounds to his conquests, and being the arbiter between crowned heads; and still more so, that it was in a condition to do it. He was sensibly affected with the indignities put upon his greatness by the Dutch, which he was obliged to swallow for the present, but for which he from that instant meditated revenge.

In the month of March this year, Cosmo de Medicis, prince of Tuscany, arrived in England in the course of his travels, and was received with all the honours due to his rank and particular merit. After his departure, the king was visited by prince George of Denmark, who made but a very short stay in England.

In July the University of Oxford opened the magnificent theatre built at the expence of Dr. Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury, their chancellor, though he afterwards resigned this dignity to the duke of Ormond.

This * summer the king diverted himself with making several progresses into the country, to view the ports and navy. He sent a squadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by sir Thomas Allen, who forced the Algerines to a peace, very advantageous to England. Nothing memorable besides what has been taken notice of, happened during the rest of the year, except some embassies, which the sequel requires should be mentioned. Sir William Godolphin was sent to the court of Spain; Mr. Ralph Montague was first envoy, and soon after ambassador to France; the earl of Carlisle went ambassador to Stockholm, and sir William Temple ambassador extraordinary to the States-General. On the other hand, monsieur Colbert was sent from France to reside at the English court.

Some changes were likewise made at court in the public employs. Sir Thomas Clifford was made treasurer of the household; the duke of Monmouth, the king's natural son, was made captain of his life-guard of horse; sir John Trevor, lately returned from France, where he had been envoy, was sworn one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, on the resignation of sir William Morrice, to whom he had given ten thousand pounds sterling.

The year 1669 produced very few remarkable events in England, if we except a scheme which the king fell upon with regard to religion, which he seems to have adopted with a double view; first, to gain the presbyterians, who were very numerous in the kingdom, over to his interest. Secondly, to attach the papists more strongly to him, by procuring a remission of the severe restrictions they lay under. To effect this, he proposed to incorporate the presbyterians with the church of England, and obtain a toleration for all the other sects of nonconformists. The lord-keeper, sir Orlando Bridgeman, was directed to procure a conference between some of the most eminent of the episcopal and the presbyterian ministers; and to make them proposals for a comprehension of such dissenters as could be brought into communion with the church of England; and for procuring a toleration for the independants and other sects. The episcopal divines, whether out of a spirit of christian charity, or to make their court to the sovereign, shewed themselves very compliable on this occasion, and even made large concessions; and nothing remained to put the final hand to an accommodation, but the point of re-ordination of the presbyterian ministers, which was at last settled by the consent of both parties *. Matters being thus adjusted, the lord chief-justice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehension, and the lord-keeper engaged to support it in parliament with his whole interest.

In the mean time, whether the secret of what passed in the conferences was not well kept, or the non-conformists, by encouragement from the court, assumed too much liberty, the archbishop of Canterbury resolved to use his utmost endeavours to break their measures. For this purpose he writ to all the suffragan bishops a circular letter, enjoining them to make exact enquiry into the conventicles held in their dioceses. After he was provided with the necessary informations, he went to the king, and obtained from him a proclamation to put the laws against conventicles into execution, and particularly the act for restraining non-conformists from inhabiting in corporations. This proclamation was executed much in the same manner with others against papists: for about two months after, the king ordered the non-conformist ministers to be told from him, that he was desirous to make them easy; and if they thought fit to petition him, they would be favourably heard. A petition was accordingly drawn up, and presented to the king at the earl of Arlington's lodgings, who received it graciously, and returned a favourable answer, importing, "That he would do his utmost to get them comprehended with the public establishment."

This project, however necessary to the king's designs, was nevertheless directly contrary to the principles of the parliament, who were averse to all condescension, so that it ended only in smoke: nay, further, when they met in October this year, pursuant to their prorogation, they addressed the king to thank him for his proclamation against conventicles; and, not contented with this step, they appointed a committee to make exact enquiries concerning the conduct of the non-conformists. These having received a great number of informations, reported, "That divers conventicles and seditious assemblies were held in the very neighbourhood of the parliament, so as to insult the government, and endanger the peace of the kingdom." Hereupon the house immediately declared, "That they would adhere to his majesty for the support of the government in church and state, against all sorts of adversaries." The meaning of the vote was easy to be understood.

During the latter part of the last session, a great dispute had fallen out between the commons and the lords, in relation to the case of one Skinner, and some transactions of the East India company, which was renewed with great acrimony; and their mutual animosity daily increasing, and the king knowing that he had nothing to expect in the way of supply, or other matters, from the commons till this affair was compromised, prorogued the parliament from the eleventh of December to the fourteenth of February following.

This year died in France queen Henrietta Maria, the king's mother; and in England, the famous George Monk, duke of Albemarle, the restorer of the royal family; as also Mr. Prynne, who was so severely handled for writing against the court in the last reign. This man was an indefatigable writer, having been the author of no fewer than two hundred treatises, most of them indeed of little esteem; but let it be remembered of him, that he was a considerable instrument in the Restoration, and upon that account was received into favour upon the change of government, and had the records of the Tower committed to his care, which he put into good order. He died a member of the present parliament.

The parliament of Scotland met about the same time with that of England, being convened by lord Lauderdale, as his majesty's high commissioner. As this nobleman made so great a figure both in England and Scotland in the reign whose history I am now writing, I believe it will not be foreign to the purpose to take some notice of him.

Charles Maitland, earl (soon afterwards created duke) of Lauderdale, was a rigid presbyterian, during the troubles in Scotland a zealous covenant, and a distinguished enemy to the royal authority. He nevertheless threw himself into the king's party in 1647, when duke Hamilton invaded England in support of Charles the First. From this time his country looked on him as a declared enemy; but after the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, and the composition of the differences in that kingdom, he followed the king into England, was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester; and by removals from one prison to another, continued in confinement till the king's restoration. During his imprisonment, he had great impressions of religion on his mind; but after the king had received him into his favour and council, he so entirely wore them out, that hardly any trace of them was left. Whether from a knowledge of the secret sentiments of the king and duke of York, with regard to religion, or only from a suspicion of theirs, he was of opinion, that the best way to preserve himself in their favour, was to enter into all the king's supposed views, and to labour to render him absolute in both kingdoms. Upon the king's restoration, it was debated in council, whether episcopacy should be restored in Scotland; the duke of Lauderdale opposed the motion with all his power, and gave this extraordinary reason for it; namely,

* It was settled, that all presbyterian ministers who had been already ordained, should be admitted into the ministry of the church of England, with this form:—"Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and administer the holy sacraments, in any congregation of England, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereto." Rapin. Echard. Burnet.

That the Scots, if they were governed according to the grain of their own inclinations, would be always at the king's devotion on any occasion of dispute he might afterwards have with the parliament of England. This advice, though it was not complied with, was acceptable to the king, and riveted the duke in his favour. The resolution to restore episcopacy having been executed, no person appeared more ardent against the presbyterians, nor had they a more violent persecutor. I shall have occasion to say more of him afterwards, but this may suffice to give the reader some idea of his character.

It was by the intrigues and authority of this nobleman that the parliament, held this year in Scotland, passed an act which raised the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical matters higher than ever it had been carried before: as also another act concerning the militia, by which it was at the immediate service of the king, should he ever have occasion to overawe his subjects in England; but at the same time, it might be ordered to march without his appearing to countenance its motions, so that he was enabled to disown them with a better grace, should an expedition of that sort miscarry.

The parliament meeting on the fourteenth of February, 1670, the king, in a speech to both houses, demanded a supply in the most pressing terms, and concluded with earnestly recommending to them, to consider of a plan for uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The commons readily acceded to the first part of his request, and voted funds for the produce of one million seven hundred thousand pounds, a sum which however fell very short of the king's necessities. The dispute between the two houses about the affair of Skinner and the East India company was still undecided. The king, apprehensive of a fresh rupture between them, persuaded the peers to agree to a general rasure of all the proceedings relating to that controversy; the commons gave their assent to this procedure; and thus the matter dropt: but the poor nonconformists were pitched upon as the peace-offering on this occasion: for no sooner was the accommodation effected, than the two houses, on the tenth of April, 1670, joined in passing an act, importing, "That if any person above the age of sixteen should be present at any meeting for religious exercises, in any other manner than according to the Liturgy of the church of England, where there were five persons or more, besides those of the family, he should pay five shillings for the first offence, and ten for the second; the preachers in such meetings to forfeit twenty pounds for the first, and forty pounds for the second offence; and those who suffered such conventicles in their houses, barns, yards, &c. to forfeit twenty pounds." The informers being very busy on these occasions, the dissenters were exceedingly harrassed. But the king put a stop to these severities: and having passed the money-bill, with this and some other acts, adjourned the houses to the twenty-fourth of October.

The money which this parliament had granted to Charles, had the same fate of most of the other supplies he had received from them. It was lavished upon his mistresses and his favourites; and so far was he from thinking of making good his engagements with the States of Holland, that he was busy in concerting measures for entering into a more strict union than ever with France. Full of the idea of rendering himself absolute, he saw no surer method to effect that design, than to secure the friendship and assistance of Lewis XIV. To this chimerical project, he sacrificed every sentiment of honour, justice, and humanity. Charles, in his choice of counsellors, had selected such persons as he knew were most subservient to his will, either through interest or a parity of principles. No wonder therefore if they encouraged him in all his favourite measures, how contrary soever to the interest of England, and the general good of all Europe; and willingly partook with him in the guilt of violating the most sacred engagements, and abandoning those who placed the most unlimited faith in his royal word. This council consisted of the five following persons; Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley Cooper, and Lauderdale. It was nicknamed the CABAL, from the initial letters of their names. Their servile flattery, and the licentiousness of their manners, were what chiefly recommended them to the favour and the confidence of their sovereign, while by their pernicious counsels they had well nigh proved the ruin of both prince and people. In a word, it was by their advice that Charles now sought an opportunity to break the treaty he had so lately concluded with the States, and to enter into another of a direct opposite tendency with the king of France.

The war with the States was to be renewed upon the slightest pretences; but it seems to be truly a part of the scheme that the king, or his brother the duke of York for him, had formed for overturning the protestant religion. The States were to be destroyed, to make way for the more easy introduction of arbitrary power and popery in England: but this French alliance was to be kept secret till the king had got what he could of his parliament, by plausible pretences of the necessity of arming, for the security of the nation, against any foreign attempts, as France and Holland were both making great preparations.

The king, however, though extremely fond of the French alliance, seems never to have been fully determined, till the visit which he received from his sister, the duchess of Orleans, who came to England in May this year. Lewis XIV. well acquainted with the art and address of that amiable princess, and the great ascendant she had acquired over her brother, had prevailed on her to exert all her interest, in order to draw off England from the triple league, which he was sensible had raised an invincible barrier to his ambition. This young princess then, who was only twenty-five years of

* If to the above five members of the Cabal are joined, as in reason they ought, the king and the duke of York, it will be found that all the seven were for an absolute and arbitrary government; and that with regard to religion, four of the seven were papists, namely, the king, the duke, Arlington, and Clifford; and three without any religion, or at least they considered it only as an engine of state; these were, Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale. Rapin. Burnet.

age, was the plenipotentiary pitched upon to put the finishing stroke to this business. A visit which the king of France was to make to his new acquired possessions of Dunkirk and Lisle, served as a pretence for the duchess's journey over to England to see her brother, who being prepared for the occasion, went as far as Dover to meet her, where they spent ten days together in great joy and festivity. In their conferences together, she artfully insinuated to him, that nothing was wanting to make him the most glorious monarch in the world, and to recompense him for all the misfortunes he had suffered in the first years of his reign, but to render himself as absolute in England as other crowned heads were in their dominions. This glorious end, she observed, he could never hope to compass, so long as his subjects had any prospect of assistance from their brethren in republican principles, the Dutch; and therefore it behoved him to humble these latter, when he would find no difficulty in keeping his own people within the bounds of obedience; adding, that he might rest assured the king of France would assist him with what assistance of men or money he should think proper to require, in case of any commotions in England. Charles, blinded by the love he bore his sister, and intoxicated with the prospect of governing with unlimited authority, signed every thing that Lewis desired, and laid a foundation for the ruin of his allies, in the midst of feasting and diversions.

Lewis, however, knowing the disposition of Charles, and the natural inconstancy of his temper, resolved to bind him down to his engagements by the bands of pleasure. For this purpose he sent over with the princess Henrietta, mademoiselle de Querouaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and accomplishments, which instantly captivated the heart of Charles. She accompanied him to London, was created duchess of Portsmouth, and maintained her empire over him during the whole course of his life. She kept him to the connections with France, and continued to be the reigning favourite, while his former mistress, lady Cleveland, was raised to the dignity of duchess, as a recompence for the influence she had lost.

The joy which Charles derived from his new alliance, was greatly damped by the loss of his sister *, who died in a sudden and shocking manner, immediately after her return to France. This event made no alteration in what had been resolved upon between the two kings. Charles dispatched the duke of Buckingham to Paris (though on another pretence) to conclude and sign the treaty; by which the spoils of the Dutch, devoted to destruction, were shared between the two powers, in the same manner as Flanders had been shared between the Dutch and the French in 1635.

Matters however could not be carried on so secretly, but that the rumour of this alliance, and the end it was designed for, began to spread abroad; but Europe listened to it without being stirred. The emperor taken up with seditions in Hungary, the Swede lulled asleep with negotiations, and the Spanish monarchy still weak, and ever irresolute and slow in its determinations, left Lewis to follow the career of his ambition uninterrupted.

In September this year, he made an irruption into Lorraine by his general marshal de Crequi. The duke, who was taken unawares, was obliged to fly, and leave his duchy a prey to the marshal, who took possession of it in the name of his master. The duke vainly hoped for the interposition of Charles to the king of France, in return for so much money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer of his forces for his restoration. His envoy was answered, "That the king was sorry for what had happened, and that the present violence, like the mischiefs of a sudden inundation, must be endured at this time."

The Dutch now began to apprehend some design against their safety; but to compleat their misfortunes, their country was at that time divided into two factions; the one composed of rigid republicans, to whom the least shadow of absolute authority seemed a monster contrary to the laws of human society; the other of republicans of a more moderate disposition, who were desirous of investing the young prince of Orange, afterwards the famous William III. with the posts and dignities of his ancestors. The grand pensionary John de Wit, and his brother Cornelius, were at the head of the rigid sticklers for liberty; but the young prince's party began to gain ground. The republic was more attentive to its domestic dissensions, than to the danger which threatened it from without, and this contributed to its own ruin.

Lewis not only purchased the king of England, but he likewise brought over the elector of Cologne, and the famous Van Galen, bishop of Munster, who was greedy of war and plunder, and was naturally an enemy to the Dutch. Lewis had formerly assisted them against this bishop; he now joined with him for their destruction. The Swedes, who in 1668, had united with the republic to check the projects of a conqueror, who had then no designs against them, abandoned her as soon as they saw her threatened with ruin, and renewed their old connections with France, on condition of receiving the former subsidies.

It is somewhat singular and worthy of remark, that of all the enemies who were about to fall upon this petty state, there was not one that could allege a lawful pretext for entering into the war. This was much such an undertaking as the league between Lewis XII. and the emperor Maximilian, as king of Spain, who entered into a covenant to destroy the republic of Venice, only for being rich and haughty †. I have somewhat preadvanced the order of these events, and therefore must return back.

The parliament of England meeting on October 24, the king addressed them in a short speech, and then the lord-keeper by his orders represented the pressing exigencies of the state, and the absolute necessity of an immediate supply: he told them, "That France and the States-general were powerfully arming by sea and land, were building new ships, and filling their magazines with all sorts of warlike stores and provisions: that since the beginning of the last war with Holland, France had increased her maritime force above three times what it was before; and Holland also, since the conclusion of the peace, had been diligent in augmenting her fleets: that in such a juncture, common prudence required that his majesty should make some suitable preparations: that he had therefore given orders for the fitting out fifty sail of the greatest ships against the spring, besides those which were to be for the security of trade, as foreseeing if he should neglect to put his navy on a respectable footing, such neglect might be a temptation to those who seem not now to intend it, to offer an affront, if not do an injury, to this nation." He then expatiated upon the several advantageous leagues his majesty had entered into for the defence of his kingdom, and the benefit of commerce, particularly instancing the Triple Alliance with the Dutch and Swede, and the treaties concluded with Portugal and Denmark. Finally, he assured them that the king would prorogue the parliament at Christmas, and desired they would regulate their measures accordingly.

The commons were the dupes of this shameful prevarication of the king, and ignorant of, or at least not crediting, the report of his engagements with France, voted him two millions and an half sterling. Never had a larger supply been granted by the parliament, and never surely was it less deserved by the measures of the king and his council, such of them, I mean, as were concerned in the management of the late shameful negotiation with France. The ordinary council consisted of twenty-one persons, but these were thought by no means proper to be entrusted with the conduct of this affair; indeed it was thought impossible to engage so many persons of the first rank in such a plot upon their country. To effect therefore this undertaking with the greater caution and safety, the king had established a cabinet council of the five persons we have already named, under the title of the CABAL, which was denominated the committee of council for foreign affairs; and prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, secretary Trevor, and even the lord-keeper Bridgman, men of incorruptible integrity, were never admitted to any of their deliberations.

The king having brought the commons to his lure, thought proper to adjourn the parliament till about the end of January. In the mean time, sir William Temple, the English resident at Holland, was recalled from thence, but on pretence that the king only wanted to confer with him about some private affairs, after which he should be allowed to return. That minister had acquired so great a reputation for honour and integrity, that the Cabal were persuaded no orders could prevail on him to promote or countenance measures which were destructive to the interest of his country. De Wit, who was an admirer of the great and good qualities of the English resident, could not part with him without great regret. The flimsy artifice made use of to remove him from the Hague was clearly seen through, and the Dutch now began to be fully convinced of the insincerity of Charles. Accordingly, they ordered their ambassador here to acquaint the king, that they should regard the recall of sir William Temple as an undoubted proof of a change of measures in the English court.*

The parliament resuming its session the latter end of January, the king in February sent a message to hasten the money bills: but the commons, in conjunction with the lords, presented to him a solemn address upon the great growth of popery, representing the causes and the remedies: one of which was, that no papist, or reputed papist, should be capable of holding any office, civil or military. The king, according to custom, set forth a proclamation against them, which was only matter of form, and without any manner of effect, as was all along the case, from the beginning of the reign of James I. to the end of Charles II.

When the first of the money-bills went up to the house of lords, the lord Lucas made a most severe speech against the enormous grants made to the crown, and the shameful manner in which those supplies had been squandered away. He concluded his speech with these words: "While we are continually giving, and the king as continually craving, it is necessary to make some estimate for ourselves. Would his majesty be pleased to have a quarter of our estates, for my part, he should have it. Would he be pleased to have the half; for my part, upon good occasions, he shall have it: but then let us have some assurances of the quiet enjoyment of that residue, and know what we have to trust to." The king had for some time made a practice of going to the house of peers without formality, on pretence of hearing the debates for his amusement, though his real design was to influence their deliberations. This bold speech of lord Lucas's gave his majesty, who was then present, great umbrage; but he was incensed beyond measure when he saw it soon afterwards printed and published, and issued an order to have it burned by the hands of the common executioner.

It had however made so great an impression on the august assembly in which it was delivered, that the lords began to make some alterations in the money-bill which had been transmitted by the commons. These latter highly resented this attempt, which they considered as an infringement on their undoubted right of regulating all money-bills. Conferences were held between the two houses, in order to compromise the quarrel: but instead of coming to an amicable agreement, they carried the dispute to such an height, that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament; and it was near two years before it sat again. By this means, however, he lost the money that had been voted him†.

Before we proceed, we must not forget to mention the death of Anne duchess of York, daughter to Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon. She deceased on the thirty-first of March, 1671. In the time of her indisposition, which was very long, she abjured the protestant religion. She left two daughters, Mary and Anne, both afterwards queens of England. That the duke of York himself was a papist before the king's restoration, is very certain, though we know not the precise time of his changing his religion. The thing was a secret for some time, but of late years it was become the public talk of the court and kingdom. At last, soon after the death of his duchess, he made a formal abjuration of the protestant faith, and from that time openly declared himself a member of the church of Rome.

A very extraordinary accident happened about this time: one Blood, a discarded officer of the late protector's, with two or three accomplices, found means to steal the crown and globe out of the Tower. Blood was a most daring villain: he had some time before made an attempt to assassinate the duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and had failed in his purpose, but escaped without discovery. He was detected in this second villainy; but by a strange lenity, or rather weakness in Charles, he not only pardoned him, but settled a pension of five hundred pounds a year on him, in land in Ireland. It is said the audacious ruffian had intimidated the king into compliance, by solemnly swearing that he belonged to a chosen band, who would not fail to revenge his death on Charles himself, and all his family, having taken such measures for that purpose, as no human cunning or precaution could prevent.

No wonder that a conduct in the king, so big with error and absurdity, should fill the minds of the people with discontent and ill humour; and this spirit of dissatisfaction was still farther increased by another action of his, which evidently tended to the destruction of public credit. His profusion was so great, that notwithstanding the large sums he had received from parliament, and seven hundred thousand pounds he had touched from the French, viz. on entering into the late treaty with them against Holland, he was still in want of money. Upon this the Cabal advised him to shut up the exchequer, which he actually did; and it continued shut for a year and some months, to the great distress and ruin of many families, who had lent their fortunes on government security. No king of England before Charles had ever dared to risk the commission of such a flagrant act of injustice; and in any other times he himself might have fallen the victim of his own oppression and folly. The whole kingdom resounded with complaints. The most severe libels against the king and his court flew all over the nation; but Charles, regardless of those unavailing marks of discontent, persisted in his own way, and forgot, in the arms of love and pleasure, the reproaches he incurred by his avarice and injustice.

ruffians in the street, and having his nose slit. He was a member of parliament, and a great opposer of the money-bills; and when they were passed proposed laying a tax upon the play-houses, at the same time throwing out some indecent reflections against the king and his favourites. It is said he was assassinated by persons set on by the court for that purpose. In this session the act of Navigation was repealed.

The next measure of the court was no less displeasing to the nation in general, and was indeed an open violation of what the king promised to both houses of parliament when they presented the address against papists. Charles (in virtue of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters) issued a proclamation, suspending the penal laws which had been made against all nonconformists and recusants whatsoever, and granting to the protestant dissenters, the public exercise of their religion, and to the catholics the exercise of it in their private houses. At first sight this act carries a plausible, and even praise-worthy appearance; but the dispositions of the king and court convinced every thinking man of those times, that this was no other than a scheme for introducing by degrees the full and uninterrupted use of their religion to the catholics; or, in other words, to exalt popery above the established faith of the kingdom. The event proves the truth of this conjecture. It is observable, that the lord-keeper Bridgman refused to put the seals to this edict for suspending the penal laws, and was for that reason, though under different pretexts, deprived of his office. Sir Anthony-Ashley Cooper was appointed chancellor in his place, and created earl of Shaftesbury. Soon after sir Thomas Clifford was made lord Clifford and lord high-treasurer, the lord Arlington an earl, and the earl of Lauderdale a duke. Thus did all the members of the infamous Cabal receive the wages of their iniquity. These proceedings took up the greatest part of the year 1671, and the beginning of 1672*: but a blow was now going to be struck which the nation little expected, and which filled every honest mind with amazement, shame, and indignation.

In the preceding year the court of England had taken occasion to pick a quarrel with the Dutch, on account of their fleet under the admiral Van Ghent having neglected to pay the honours due to the English flag, though at that time flying aboard a yacht only that had been sent to bring the lady Temple over from Holland, and that the Dutch fleet was then riding in their own harbour. The Dutch offered to make any concession agreeable with reason and justice; but the Cabal, bent upon the infamous war they had projected against the States, persisted in complaining of this as an unpardonable insult, and declined to enter upon any compromise.

In the spring of this year it became generally known that the great naval preparations making by the court were destined against the States-General: but, previous to publishing the cause of this war, a perfidious attempt was made upon the Dutch Smyrna fleet, amounting to seventy sail, and valued at a million and an half. The design however failed, after an engagement of three days, by the bravery of the Dutch admiral: and Charles, no longer able to keep on the mask, declared war in form against the States-General on the seventeenth of March, 1672. Never surely were reasons more absurd and ridiculous, employed to cover a flagrant violation of treaty. Complaints were made of injuries offered to the East India company, which yet that company disowned. The detention of some English subjects in Surinam was alleged, tho' it was known that they had remained voluntarily in that island: the refusal of a Dutch fleet on their own coasts to pay the honours of the flag to an English yacht is represented as an unpardonable insult: and, to compleat the farce, mention was made of some abusive pictures, reflecting on the English nation *.

To clear up the meaning of this last article, it will be necessary to inform the reader, that after the destroying the English ships in the harbour of Chatham, Cornelius de Wit, brother to the great pensionary, who was then aboard the Dutch fleet, and performed considerable service, had caused his own portrait to be painted; on the back ground of which were represented some ships on fire in an harbour. The truth is, that de Wit had indulged himself in this trifling monument of his fame; but the picture itself was in a manner unknown. The English ministers, who had transmitted their master's pretended grievances in writing to the States-General, made mention of "certain abusive pictures." Now the Dutch, who always translate the memorials of foreign states into French, had rendered the term Abusive, by the French words fautifs, trompeurs, "False or Lying Pictures." Upon which they returned for answer, that they did not know what was meant by Lying Pictures. In short, they never once conceived that it related to this portrait of their fellow-citizen; nor could they imagine this to be a pretext for the war.

This declaration of war by the English was quickly followed by another on the part of the king of France, who had little else to allege for the reasons of this rupture but the affair of Van Beuninghen's medal, already spoken of.

All that the efforts of ambition and human forefight could devise for the destruction of a nation, was put in practice by Lewis XIV. for exterminating the wretched States of Holland. According to monsieur de Voltaire, no less than fifty millions of livres, worth ninety-seven millions of their present currency †, were expended in the most pompous preparations. Thirty men of war, of fifty guns each, joined the English fleet, which consisted of an hundred sail. The French monarch, accompanied by his brother the duke of Orleans, marched at the head of one hundred and twelve thousand men towards Maistrecht and Charleron, on the frontiers of Spanish Flanders and Holland. The bishop of Munster and the elector of Cologne had about twenty thousand men. The prince of Condé and marshal Turenne were the head generals of the French king's army, and the duke of Luxemburg commanded under them. The famous engineer Vauban was appointed to manage the sieges. Against such a formidable force, so many renowned generals, and immense treasures in money to bribe the fidelity of those who commanded garrisons; what had the republic of Holland to oppose? A young prince of a weak constitution, who had never seen a battle nor a siege, and about twenty-five thousand ill-trained soldiers, which were all the military force of the country. In a word, the destruction of the republic appeared inevitable.

The States-General, in the utmost consternation, wrote to the king of France, beseeching him in the humblest manner to let them know if the great preparations he was making were really destined against them, how they had offended him, or what satisfaction he required? To these submissions he returned for answer, "That he should employ his troops in such manner as became his dignity, for which he should be accountable to no one."

In May Lewis took the field, and soon made himself master of all Guelderland, and the towns upon the Yssel. The inhabitants of Utrecht sent the keys of their city to the conqueror, and the whole province of that name capitulated. Lewis made his entry into Utrecht on the twentieth of June in triumph. Only the provinces of Holland and Zealand remained free; and Amsterdam itself seemed but to wait the hour of its slavery or destruction. A little more diligence on the part of the king of France would have put this important fortress into his hands. This capital once taken, not only the republic itself must have fallen, but there would no longer have been such a state as Holland. Some of the richest families, and those who were zealous lovers of liberty, were preparing to fly their devoted country, and embark for Batavia. Nor were the Dutch thus distressed by land only; the combined fleets of England and France threatened the destruction of their maritime powers, and the annihilation of their navy. The States, however, had not been negligent in putting their fleet on a respectable footing; and de Ruyter, with a fleet of 90 ships, was sent in quest of the English and French fleets, which were commanded by the duke of York and the marshal d'Estrées, and were riding in Solebay harbour ‡ in a careless manner, as little expecting a vessel from an enemy that seemed to have so much work cut out for them at home. Cornelius de Wit was on board as deputy from the States. The English were very near being surprized; but recovering themselves, they slipped their cables, as did also the French, and stood out to meet the enemy, when there followed a most desperate engagement, in which the commanders and seamen on each side displayed the greatest conduct and courage imaginable. In short, after a most bloody dispute, in which the loss on both sides was very great, they separated with equal success. The ship on board of which the earl of Sandwich hoisted his flag as admiral of the blue squadron, was blown up, with himself and the whole crew, amounting to one thousand men; and on the side of the Dutch, rear-admiral Van Ghent was killed. The historians of the two parties equally pretend to the honour of the chasing of the enemy's fleet; but both the one and the other speak in a manner which discovers no great assurance: for it is not with engagements at sea as with those at land, where commonly he that remains upon the field of battle has a right to assume the honour of the victory: whereas in naval engagements, a fog, a calm, a wind either contrary or tempestuous, may force the fleet which has had the advantage to retreat the first. However, this be, bonfires were equally made at London and the Hague for the joy of this victory, though with very little reason on either side. The English complained that the French were wanting in their duty, and only fought at a distance, after they had separated from the fleet. This conduct was ascribed to secret orders given to count d'Estrées, not to expose too much his majesty's ships, but to leave the English and Dutch fleets to effect their own destruction.

The Dutch were now in a most melancholy situation; and to add to their distresses, the state was distracted by the divisions which commonly arise among an unfortunate people, who impute to each other the public calamities. The grand pensionary John de Wit thought there was no other way left to save what remained of his wretched country, but by suing to the victors for peace. Full of a republican spirit, and jealous of his personal authority, he dreaded the aggrandisement of the house of Orange still more than the conquests of the French king. The prince of Orange, on his side, who had more ambition than de Wit, and was as much attached to his country, tried all means to obtain the stadtholdership, and opposed a peace with as much vehemence as de Wit promoted it. The States, however, came to a resolution to sue for peace; and deputies were sent to the French camp to implore mercy in the name of a republic, who six months before looked upon itself as the arbiter of kings. Lewis received the deputies with an arrogance that was an insult upon humanity; and when, after passing to and fro, he at length deigned to dictate the terms on which he would permit them to exist as a state; his demands were little better than articles of slavery; and a peace on those conditions appeared insupportable. The haughtiness of the conqueror inspired the vanquished with a desperate courage, and it was unanimously resolved to die fighting.

The province of Holland, to stop the progress of the invader, opened her sluices, and laid the country under water. In this exigency the hearts and hopes of every one were turned to the prince of Orange. The populace grew furious against the grand pensionary, who had sued for peace, and whom they called the betrayer of his country. The prince, by his politics and his party, increased the ferment. Cornelius de Wit, the pensionary's brother, was accused of a design to murder the prince. At length the two brothers were, on the twentieth of August, massacred at the Hague by the mad multitude, after one of them had governed the republic for upwards of nineteen years with the most unspotted integrity; and the other had hazarded his life in fighting its battles. The most shocking cruelties which could enter the imagination of a furious populace, were exercised upon the dead bodies of the noble victims.

The murder of the de Wits extinguished for the time the party dissensions; and all men, from fear or prudence, were unanimous in submitting to the prince of Orange; the States also came to a resolution to recall the edict which the pensionary had caused to be made in the year 1667, and by which they obliged themselves never to admit the dignity of a stadtholder, and the prince of Orange was accordingly admitted to that office.

The combined princes perceiving they were likely to meet with a vigorous opposition, tried all means to corrupt the prince of Orange, then only twenty-two years old: but all in vain. They offered him the sovereignty of Holland, with the united forces of France and England to support him therein; but he rejected the proposal with scorn: and when the desperate condition of his country was urged as a reason for his compliance, he answered with a spirit that would have done honour to the most distinguished heroes of liberty and patriotism that we read of in history: "I have yet one way left, replied he, not to be spectator of the final ruin of my country, and that is, to die in the last dyke." In fine, the actions of this young prince every way corresponded with the sentiments he professed. Being now invested with the full authority, he bent all his efforts against the common enemy. He overflowed all the passes by which the French could penetrate into the rest of the country. By his prompt and secret negotiations, he roused the emperor, the empire, the Spanish council, and the government of Flanders, from their lethargy; he even disposed the English court to listen to peace. In a word, Lewis had entered Holland in May, and before September all Europe was in confederacy against him. Montecuculli, governor of Flanders, sent a few regiments privately to the assistance of the United Provinces: the emperor Leopold likewise dispatched Montecuculli at the head of twenty thousand men; and the elector of Brandenburg took the field with twenty-five thousand troops, whom he kept in his own pay.

The French king now quitted his army, as there were no more conquests to be made in a country that was overflowed. It was even dangerous to keep the provinces which had been conquered. Lewis, desirous to secure the glory he had acquired, contented himself with having taken such a number of towns in so short a space of time; and leaving Turenne and Luxembourg to finish the war, he returned to St. Germain, about the end of summer, to enjoy his triumphs. But while his subjects were every where erecting monuments of his conquest, the powers of Europe were at work to snatch them out of his hands, considering the reduction of Holland as the prelude to their own slavery; and having no hopes of being able to defend themselves, should the power of France, already exorbitant, be still farther increased by such a mighty accession.

It is now time to direct the reader's attention to the state of affairs in England, of which I shall proceed to give a short detail, confining myself only to the principal transactions.

Whilst the nation was generally uneasy at the late proceedings of the court, the king's excessive prodigality having rendered all the sums he had received insufficient for carrying on the war, the Cabal found it necessary at last to have recourse to a parliament, which broke all their measures. Indeed they were hardly sat down, which they did on the fourth of February, 1673, when it appeared that the Country Party, or rather that of the people, was become more powerful in the house of commons than the court party; and it was not till after a submission the most humiliating that a sovereign could make, that Charles could obtain of them the supplies he demanded.

I have already taken notice that the court, agreeable to the plan it had formed of reducing the nation to a state of absolute dependance on the crown, had issued a declaration for liberty of conscience. The earl of Shaftesbury, lord chancellor, had been the principal promoter of this measure; and there is reason to believe that if the king had seconded what he had begun, with any degree of firmness and resolution, as he had faithfully promised the Cabal he would do, he might have succeeded in this design, which, happily for the nation, was rendered for ever unattainable by his weakness and caprice. To make this more clear to the reader, it will be necessary to observe, that the Roman catholics being, in virtue of this declaration, rendered capable of enjoying posts and offices in the state, and having a seat in parliament, would soon have made a considerable number in the house, through the intrigues of the court at elections; and have carried any point they pleased against the protestant members. Hence a parliament, composed of a majority of papists, would in fact have been little better than a body blindly devoted to the court, if only from motives of gratitude to their patrons and benefactors. The earl of Shaftesbury, before he communicated this plan to the king, had resolved with himself, in case Charles should want resolution in the prosecution of it, to quit the court party, and join the opposition; by that means, to secure himself from the persecution which he foresaw would befall him, as the adviser, or at least promoter, of so pernicious a step, which threatened the subversion of the established system of government both in church and state. The example of the earl of Clarendon was as yet too recent to be forgotten, and he made not the least doubt that his sovereign would as readily sacrifice him to the indignation of the parliament and the people, as he had done that faithful servant.

The event proved the truth of his suspicions. Charles failed in his resolution at the very time it behoved him to have maintained it with the greatest firmness. He was distressed for money: he found he could not hope for a supply, unless he revoked his declaration of liberty of conscience, against which the parliament, and the most respectable bodies of the kingdom, had presented to him formal addresses. He tried indeed to break, or at least weaken the opposition, by proroguing the parliament: but they resumed their remonstrances with their session. The duke of York, and most of the Cabal, advised the king to support his declaration. Charles, after wavering some time, preferred his interest to the engagements he had entered into with his party; and from a greediness of money only, not from any conviction of the badness of his former measures, he at last recalled his declaration. The Cabal and the popish party were exceedingly incensed at this want of resolution in the king; and the earl of Shaftesbury immediately quitting the court, came over to the Country Party, and was now the foremost in the house of lords against popery, the Dutch war, and the alliance with France.

The commons, not contented with this triumph over the court, soon after passed another bill, with the concurrence of the lords, entitled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may happen from popish recusants," commonly called The Test Act, whereby "all persons enjoying any office, or place of trust or profit, were required to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and also to receive the communion (after the rites of the church of England) in some parish church, &c." They next presented two petitions concerning grievances; and the king having promised to redress them, they passed the money-bill without mentioning any thing of the war, lest they should seem to approve of it: and moreover a proviso was tacked to it, importing, "That no papist should be capable of holding any public employment."

This bill and the Test Act was passed by the king on the twenty-ninth of March, 1673, and the parliament was then adjourned to October. The consequence of the Test Act was, that the popish officers resigned their places; and among the rest the duke of York his post of lord high-admiral, and the lord Clifford his treasurer's staff, who died soon after. Sir Thomas Osborne, created earl of Danby, succeeded him in the office of treasurer; and Shaftesbury, whose revolt from the Cabal was now universally known, was deprived of the office of chancellor, and sir Heneage Finch made keeper of the great seal.

The late mortification which the king met with from his parliament was not the only one by which he may be said to have purchased the subsidy it granted him. His brother the duke of York, then a widower, had determined to contract a new engagement, and had fixed his eyes on Mary, sister to the duke of Modena, a princess educated in the Romish faith. This alliance was warmly opposed by the parliament, who on the occasion presented an address to the king, conceived in the strongest terms, and expressive of their apprehensions from such a match. They were, however, very little regarded; and the duke of York, resolved not to be contradicted in a point he thought so essential to the happiness of his life, publicly espoused that princess (who had arrived in England for that purpose) on the twenty-first of November this year, in spite of the opposition of the commons.

Charles in the mean time continued to prosecute the war against the Dutch by sea with unremitting ardour. He bestowed the chief command of the fleet on his cousin prince Rupert, in room of the duke of York. The prince having joined the French admiral, went in quest of the Dutch, to force them to an engagement; and as these latter were far from declining the offer, they soon came to blows. The first engagement was fought on the eighth of June, and proved very obstinate and bloody; but as neither side could claim the victory, the combat was renewed on the fourteenth, when, after a warm contest, the fortune of the day remained as doubtful as before. A third, which was fought on the eleventh day of August at the Texel, proved more decisive. The combined fleets fell in with the Dutch, commanded by de Ruyter and Van Tromp, a son worthy the gallant father from whom he sprung. When the action began, began, de Ruyter singled out prince Rupert; Tromp opposed himself to sir Edward Spragg, the vice-admiral; and Brankert, the Dutch rear-admiral, bore up to the marshal d'Estrees. The battle was fought with surprising emulation by the English and Dutch officers; but the French kept aloof, and left the English to sustain all the fury of the fight. In vain did prince Rupert make a signal for d'Estrees to bear down to his assistance: the other regarded it not; and the majority of the English ships had been so roughly handled, that the prince could not pursue an advantage he had gained by means of his fire-ships; and which, if properly assisted, would in all probability have obtained him a complete conquest. He therefore collected his straggled ships, and hauled off to the English shore, leaving the victory undecided, or rather in favour of the Dutch, who gained all they could wish. A rich fleet which they expected from the East-Indies, arrived unmolested in their ports: they rendered abortive a descent that had been meditated on the coast of Zealand; and, which was still a greater advantage to them, they brought the English nation to wish ardently the conclusion of a war that had exhausted it of men and money, without the least prospect of honour or profit.

The English parliament met towards the end of October, and had a warm session of only nine days, when they were again prorogued. They had found time, however, to pass the following votes: That the evil counsellors about the king were a grievance, and that the duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, and not fit to be employed in any office. When they met again on the seventh day of January, 1674, agreeable to their prorogation, they went still more earnestly to work; and being by this time fully aware of the dangerous designs of Charles, they resolved to prevent the execution of those plans of arbitrary power which he had projected, and seriously debated on the grievances of the nation. They seem in the beginning of their session to have copied the example of the parliament of 1640. Both houses addressed for a general fast, to implore the blessing of God's assistance against the dangerous efforts of popery; and the commons came to a resolution to grant no more supplies till the grievances they enumerated were redressed, and the protestant religion, and their liberties and properties, fully secured. Both houses voted by a great majority to address the king for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his majesty's presence and councils for ever. They examined the duke of Buckingham upon several queries which they prepared, in relation to some arbitrary steps of the government*; but not satisfied with his answers, they passed the same vote against him as they had done against Lauderdale. Arlington's turn came next; but he found means to clear up his conduct so much to the satisfaction of the house, that although an impeachment was prepared against him, they thought proper to drop the prosecution.

Charles was extremely shocked at these vigorous proceedings of the commons; and hearing that they had prepared a bill for a general fast, to distinguish papists from protestants, and that they were entering more warmly than ever into the examination of grievances: finding also that it would be impossible to maintain the war, which was so disagreeable to the parliament and nation in general, without money, which the former would not grant him; he began to listen to the terms proposed by the States-General for a separate peace. In vain did the marquis de Rouvigny, ambassador from Lewis XIV. make him the most tempting offers to keep him firm to his engagements; in vain did he threaten him with the stoppage of the yearly stipend of one hundred thousand pounds, which Lewis had been politic enough to give, and Charles mean enough to receive, for assisting that ambitious prince in his projects of universal power. Promises and threats were now equally unavailing. Charles chose rather to reconcile himself to his parliament and his people, by agreeing to a peace they so much desired, than to trust to the support of France. Six commissioners, of whom the earl of Arlington was one, were appointed to confer with the like number sent from the States of Holland, and in fifteen days the treaty was concluded. It was a renewal of the peace of Breda, with these additions: That the Dutch should pay the compliment to the English of striking to their flag, whether in large fleets or in a single vessel; and pay about three hundred thousand pounds to Charles, towards defraying the expence of his armaments.

This peace with Holland, which was proclaimed on the twenty-eighth of February, 1674, was very near bringing on an alliance offensive and defensive between that republic and our court against the king of France. It was warmly solicited by almost all the European powers, who represented it as the only infallible means to put a stop to the alarming progress of the French monarch, and restore a lasting peace to the many countries that had been desolated by the late cruel and inhuman war. The two houses of parliament supported these remonstrances with all their power. Their hatred to the French was so great, that they would gladly have relinquished the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to see their king armed against the common disturber of the tranquility of Europe; and would have thought no supplies too great to enable him to prosecute a war that tended to the public good. Charles, however, paid no regard to their remonstrances. Prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of still receiving a powerful assistance from France, he refused to sacrifice his ally to the resentment of his enemies. In a word, he still remained the friend of Lewis, while his subjects more and more espoused the interests of Holland, or rather of its stadtholder; an attachment which seems to have paved the way for that prince's afterwards ascending the English throne. Though the parliament thanked the king for the peace which he had concluded with the Dutch, they still continued to examine grievances; and in the course of their enquiries they attacked the court so briskly, that Charles, apprehensive of their going dangerous lengths, rendered their measures ineffectual, by an immediate prorogation; and having thus freed himself from all foreign and domestic disputes, he resumed his wonted life of indolence and debauchery*.

It was natural to think that Lewis would be highly incensed at the mean manner in which his ally the king of England had abandoned him: on the contrary, he shewed no signs of resentment, but readily accepted the mediation of Charles, which that monarch offered him towards bringing about a peace. The truth is, that the success of the campaign had fallen short of Lewis's hopes. The French were obliged to evacuate the three Dutch provinces with as much precipitation as they had conquered them, but not till they had made them pay dearly for their deliverance. The intendant Robert had raised in the single province of Utrecht only, in one year, no less than sixteen hundred and sixty-eight florins. So great was their hurry to evacuate the country, which they had over-run with such rapidity, that twenty-eight thousand Dutch prisoners were restored at a crown a man. The triumphal arch of St. Lewis's gate, and the other monuments of Lewis's conquests, were hardly finished when those conquests were already abandoned. During the course of this invasion, the Dutch had the honour of disputing the empire of the sea, and the dexterity to remove the theatre of the war out of their own country. Lewis was considered throughout Europe as one who had enjoyed the glory of a transient triumph with too much precipitation and pride. The fruits of the expedition were, that he had a bloody war to support against the united forces of the empire, Spain, and Holland; saw himself abandoned by England, at length by the bishop of Munster, and even the elector of Cologne; and left the countries he had invaded, and was compelled to quit, more hated than admired†.

The allies were not equally successful in other places. Lewis in a few weeks reconquered Franche-comté. In Alsace Turenne was able, with a much inferior force, to baffle all the attempts of the allied army. By a sudden and unexpected march he attacked and defeated at Sintzheim the duke of Lorraine and Caprara, general of the Imperialists. Seventy thousand Germans invaded Alsace, and took up their quarters in that province. Turenne, who had withdrawn into Lorraine, returned suddenly upon them. He attacked and routed a body of the enemy at Mulhausen. He drove from Colmar the elector of Brandenburg, who headed the German troops. He obtained a new victory at Turkheim: and having cleared the province entirely of the allies, he compelled them to repass the Rhine with great loss and dishonour.

Soon after the conclusion of the peace, sir William Temple was again sent ambassador to Holland, to assure the States-General of his Britannic majesty's friendship, and to offer his mediation for putting an end to the war between the Dutch and the French: but the young prince of Orange had the command of the army; and proposing to himself great advantages in the ensuing campaign, he found means to prevail with the States to waive their acceptance of the proffered mediation, on pretence that until a greater impression could be made upon France, they had nothing to expect from negotiation.

During these transactions, the court of England underwent some alterations. Sir Joseph Williamson, who had been plenipotentiary at the court of Cologne, was appointed secretary of state in the room of the earl of Arlington, who became lord high-chamberlain, though he aspired at the office of treasurer, which the king had bestowed upon the new earl of Danby. This contest produced the most rancorous animosity between those two ministers, who mutually exerted their utmost abilities for the ruin of each other. The duke of Buckingham was disgraced, and lost the dignity of chancellor of the university of Cambridge, in which he was succeeded by the duke of Monmouth, who had signalized his courage in France, and began to be the minion of the people. Lauderdale still kept his ground, by the most assiduous application to the king's passions, and the most devoted subserviency to all his extravagant designs. Nevertheless, he was so much intimidated by the vote which had passed against him in the house of commons, that he affected openly to renounce the measures of the Cabal. He professed uncommon zeal for the protestant religion, appeared constantly at church, was punctual in receiving the communion, and advised the king to put the laws vigorously in execution against the catholics.

All these arts, however, were incapable of appeasing the resentment of the commons; for at their meeting again, the thirteenth of April, 1675, after a recess of fourteen months, the first thing they entered upon was a bill to prevent the growth of popery; wherein they declared, That the saying mass should be a sufficient evidence of a person's being a popish priest; and inflicted penalties upon such as heard mass. After which they drew up an address against the earl of Lauderdale, whose private conversation had been betrayed to them by Dr. Burnet, once a creature of the earl. In this address they charged the duke with advising his majesty to deprive his subjects of their rights and liberties; and particularly with saying in council, That his majesty's edicts were equal to laws; and with procuring acts of parliament in Scotland to establish a militia in that kingdom of twenty-two thousand men, who were obliged to march into this kingdom for any service his majesty should command, and to obey such orders as they should receive from the privy council there; by which general words they conceived this realm was liable to be invaded on any pretence whatsoever; and therefore desire that his majesty would remove the said duke from his employments, and from his majesty's presence, as a person dangerous to the government. The king, however, did not think proper to grant this request, and gave some reasons for his refusal, which were not satisfactory to the commons, who thereupon resolved to prepare a second attack against the duke*. In the mean while, they set on foot an enquiry into the conduct of the lord-treasurer, Thomas Osborne earl of Danby; but finding themselves deficient in proofs against this minister, they thought proper to let the prosecution drop; however, that the king might not want a sufficient instance of the little confidence they reposed in his royal word, they drew up an address, beseeching his majesty to recal the English forces in the French service, and forbid his majesty's subjects engaging in that service for the future. To which his majesty answered, that he would suffer no more of his subjects to engage for the future, but that he could not recal those already engaged, without prejudice to his honour, and the peace of the kingdom. The commons appeared very little satisfied with this answer. A bill was framed, declaring it treason to levy money without authority of parliament; another vacating the seats of members who accepted of offices; and another securing the liberty of the subjects, and to prevent the transporting them as prisoners to distant islands.

During these attacks of the Country Party, who were now headed and instigated to these warm proceedings by that political apostate Shaftesbury, the courtiers determined not to be idle. A bill for a new test was introduced into the house of peers by the earl of Lindsey (Bertie) for imposing upon all persons in ecclesiastical, civil, and military employments, as well as upon privy-counsellors and members of parliament, an oath renouncing the lawfulness of resisting the king, or those acting under his commission, on any pretence whatsoever, and declaring before God that they would never attempt to alter the government in church and state. This oath had been first introduced in the Corporation Act, then in the Militia Act, and afterwards more fully in the Five Mile Act; but the times were now changed, and the measures of the court appeared such, that it threatened no less than the total extinction of the liberty of the people to invest the ministry with such an extensive power of wreaking its revenge on any who should oppose them. On the other hand, the spirited, or indeed over-zealous opposition of the commons to every step of the king, and some of their late votes in particular, made the court party apprehensive of a revival of the republican principles, which was therefore to be checked in time. This diversity of opinions and views begat a very warm contest. Seventeen days were the debates continued with great zeal and animosity; and all the rhetoric and reason of both parties were displayed on this remarkable occasion. Shaftesbury signalized himself in a particular manner against the bill. He objected, that if arms might not be taken up against the king in any case, there was no distinction between an absolute and a limited monarchy: "Neither our ancestors, nor any other free people, had ever suffered their prince to have a mercenary standing army, but wisely provided that the sovereign's safety should be in them, as theirs was in him."

After all, this question appears to be little better than a dispute about words, and such as it was absolutely impossible precisely to determine, since the merit or demerit, legality or unlawfulness of resistance, must entirely depend upon the degrees of danger or opposition wherewith the people are threatened. The bill, notwithstanding the great influence of the court, was only carried by two voices in the house of peers. All the popish lords, headed by the earl of Bristol, voted against it. It was sent down to the house of commons, where it was likely to meet with a stronger opposition; but a dispute which happened between the two houses prevented the passing of this, and of every other bill formed during the present session.

One Dr. Shirley being cast in a law-suit in chancery by sir John Fagg, a member of the house of commons, preferred an appeal to the house of peers. The commons ordered Dr. Shirley to be taken into custody of their serjeant at arms: but their warrant for taking the doctor into custody was forcibly taken from the serjeant's deputy by lord Mohun. The commons having notice of it, sent to demand justice of the house of peers against the lord Mohun; and being answered, that that lord had done nothing but his duty; they resolved, That whoever should appear at the bar of the house of lords, to prosecute a suit against any member of theirs, should be deemed an infringer of the privileges of parliament. On the other hand, the house of peers resolved, That it was the undoubted right of the lords in judicature to determine in time of parliament appeals from inferior courts, where the members of either house were concerned, that there might not be a failure of justice. The commons on the contrary voted, That it was an undoubted right of their house, that none of their members be summoned to attend the lords; and afterwards came to the extravagant resolve, That there lay no appeal to the jurisdiction of the lords in parliament from courts of equity. They took into custody serjeant Pemberton, and the rest of the lawyers who were council in the case; and sir John Fagg, their own member, was sent to the Tower for submitting to the lords.

Conferences passed upon this between the two houses, but with so much rancour and animosity, that the king, alarmed for the consequences, came to the house of peers the ninth of June; and after reproaching the two houses for carrying their differences to such an indecent height, told them that he found no possible means of putting an end to them, and preserving the peace of the kingdom, but by a prorogation. He accordingly prorogued them to the thirteenth of October.

In the mean time, the belligerent powers on the continent seeming inclinable to terminate their disputes in an amicable way, Nimeguen† was pitched upon as the place for treating of a general peace. The ministers of the several interested powers resorted thither, but little progress was made in these negotiations the present year.

The French, as usual, made themselves masters of several places before the confederates marched out of their winter quarters, particularly the towns of Dinart and Huy, which the Dutch say was occasioned by the prince of Orange's falling ill of the small-pox; but after that prince was recovered, and had assembled his army, we find he was obliged to be a witness of the taking of Limburgh also. The Imperialists had better success upon the Rhine; for the French having lost their celebrated general the marshal Turenne, by a random shot, were obliged to repass that river; and the duke of Lorraine, who commanded upon the Moselle, defeated the marshal Crequi, and took the town of Triers. The English troops in the French service at this time composed part of that army upon the Rhine; and Churchill, afterwards the great duke of Marlborough, learnt the first rudiments of war there, under the marshal Turenne. The English also had some forces in the service of the Dutch; but this was not esteemed any breach of the neutrality they professed.

The thirteenth of October the king opened the fifteenth session of this parliament with a very short speech, in which, after having recommended union to the two houses, and the interests of the church of England, for which he pretended himself a warm advocate; he demanded a supply of them that should be sufficient for building new ships, and clearing off the anticipations of his revenue. The commons absolutely refused to grant any money for paying off the crown debts; but they voted three hundred thousand pounds for the expence of building twenty ships of a certain rate*; and appropriated the tonnage and poundage† to the support of the navy. They next took into consideration the disadvantages the nation lay under with relation to the trade with France; and it appeared that the silk and linen manufactories only imported from France, amounted to eight hundred thousand pounds and upwards; and that the manufactories of wool and silk exported to France did not amount to eighty-five thousand pounds: that all other commodities of the product and manufacture of England exported to France, did not amount to ninety thousand pounds; whereas the wine, brandy, and other commodities of the product and manufacture of France imported hither, amounted to three hundred thousand pounds and upwards, besides an incredible value in toys, new apparel, point lace, &c. so that our imports exceeded our exports thither at least a million sterling annually.

Commerce and navigation thus attended to, the commons thought it necessary, in the next place, to set a distinguishing mark on all such of their members, as, preferring their own private interest to the good of the public, had sold themselves as pensioners to the court, and were ready on any occasion to throw their votes into the scale of ministerial influence. With this view they prepared the following declaration or test for every member to take, by which they "protested before God and that house, that they had not, directly or indirectly, received any sum, gratuity, place, or pension, or the promise of any from the court, or any foreign minister, since the first of January, 1672, but what they then gave in writing to the house; nor did they know of any suit, gift, grant, or promise, to any member of the house but what they had so inserted in writing, nor had given a vote in parliament for any reward or promise whatsoever.

In the house of peers the duke of Buckingham proposed a bill for the ease of the protestant dissenters; but this bill and all other business was suspended by the revival of the dispute between the two houses, in the case of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as resolute and determined as ever in maintaining their privileges. The earl of Shaftesbury, who, ever since his defection from the court, had acted the part of an incendiary between the king and the parliament, endeavoured to spirit up the house of peers in a flaming speech, which had such an effect on his auditors, that it was moved to address his majesty to dissolve the parliament, and call another. This however was carried in the negative, though by two votes only; fifty No's against forty-eight Ay's; but the king, not chusing to give his enemies such an handle at this time, contented himself with proroguing the parliament on the twenty-second of November, to the fifteenth of February twelvemonth.

The prince of Newburgh, coming over to pay a visit to the court of England this year, was most magnificently and affectionately received and entertained, none of the foreign princes having shewn Charles more respect and kindness during his exile. About the same time the king thought fit to advance several of his children to the title and dignity of English dukes. Charles duke of Lenox (by Louise Queroualle, duchess of Portsmouth) was created duke of Richmond on the ninth of August; Charles Fitz-Roy (by the duchess of Cleveland) was created duke of Southampton on the tenth of September; and Henry Fitzroy, another natural son by the duchess of Cleveland, was created duke of Grafton on the eleventh of September.

The duchess of Mazarine having a difference with her husband, withdrew into England this year, where it is pretended she would have supplanted the duchess of Portsmouth, had not an intrigue with a certain courtier been too soon discovered to the king. He failed not, however, to assign her an annual pension of four thousand pounds sterling. Her house, to the day of her death, was the rendezvous of all the men of wit and quality; and St. Evremont, a refugee as well as herself, was one of her constant attendants. On the nineteenth of December, Heneage lord Finch, baron of Daventry, who had been only lord-keeper before, was made lord high-chancellor.

Doctor Lightfoot, the famous Rabbinical divine, died this year, as did also Bulstrode Whitlock, Esq; author of Memorials of the English Affairs, a person of great judgment and temper, who filled some of the highest posts under the Commonwealth. He was equally admired and valued for his humanity, candour, and ingenuity; and after having been twenty years upon the stage of public life, he passed the remainder of his days in a peaceful and happy retirement.

Notwithstanding Turenne was dead, and the prince of Condé withdrawn from the army, the French king continued the war against the emperor, the Spaniards, and the Dutch, with some degree of success. He had a number of officers who had been trained up under these great men; and the troops, by a long series of victories, continued to think themselves irresistible. The beginning of the campaign, 1676, the French invested Condé, and took it in the presence of the prince of Orange, and afterwards Bernheim: they also raised the siege of Maestricht, and obliged the prince to abandon it. Lewis had likewise put his marine upon a respectable footing: and now the French, who, when joined with the English, had not been able to gain any decisive victory over the Dutch fleets, gained a victory alone over the combined fleets of Spain and Holland, on the eighth of July, 1676, off Messina in Sicily. In this engagement de Ruyter, the gallant admiral of the Dutch, was slain, to the irreparable loss of his country. These and some other successes on the part of France, not that the allies were without their share of good fortune, once more inspired an inclination for peace; and the conferences for that purpose were reassumed at Nimeguen, under the mediation of the king of England, who in July this year sent thither lord Berkeley, sir William Temple, and sir Leoline Jenkins, in quality of mediating ambassadors; and there they found the plenipotentiaries of France and the States-General. Sweden was likewise very willing to treat, but the Imperialists, the Spaniards, and the elector of Brandenburg, protracted the time, in hopes of gaining further advantages, that might induce the French monarch to acquiesce in more equitable terms than they could expect from him in their present situation.

Lewis XIV. had now entirely laid aside all ambitious views upon Holland. That republic had been so skilful, or so fortunate, to appear only as an auxiliary in a war which was begun for its destruction; while the empire and Spain, who were at first only auxiliaries, were at last become the principal parties. When the campaign was over, the hopes and expectations of all Europe were turned towards the negotiations at Nimeguen. It soon appeared that the design of France was only to divide the allies, and make a separate peace with the States. The king of England was at this time placed in a situation which enabled him to act as the arbiter of Europe; and no terms which he would have dictated could have been safely refused by either party: but Charles, preferring his fatal prejudice in favour of France to the advancement of his own real interest, and the general benefit of Europe, joined Lewis in his design, and assisted him therein to the utmost of his power. He ordered sir William Temple to endeavour to bring the States and the prince of Orange to a separate peace. The States seemed inclinable to adopt this party; but the prince of Orange would not listen to any such proposal, which he said would be no better than the betraying those allies who had so generously interposed to save his country from ruin. However, to quicken the tardiness of some of the confederacy, the Dutch declared, That if they delayed any longer sending their plenipotentiaries to the congress, they would conclude a separate treaty with France. Upon this, the ambassadors of the emperor and Spain at last made their appearance, but the negotiations went on very slowly. The truth is, the hopes the allies entertained that the court of England would at last open its eyes, and declare against France, was the greatest obstacle to the peace; but Charles took care to follow such measures as were most likely to overturn all such hopes, in order to bring them to a peace, such as France desired. With this view he issued a proclamation, prohibiting any of his subjects to take commissions from any foreign powers or states in amity with his majesty, or to serve as seamen in any ship or vessel employed against any other prince or state in amity with this crown.

Ever since the late peace with Holland, the French privateers had infested the Channel in such a manner, that without any regard to the neutrality of England, they seized our ships, and, as if in open war, made prizes of them. At last, they carried their outrages and insolence so far, that the commissioners of trade were obliged to represent the matter to the king, and pray him to interpose for the security of his subjects commerce. Hereupon orders were sent to our ambassadors at the court of France to make complaints of this behaviour, and insist upon satisfaction; but it all ended in nothing. The court of France was sufficiently sensible that Charles would not break with them for trifles, so long as their monarch continued to make him the usual remittances, and therefore took no notice of these complaints.

The remaining part of the year 1676, afforded nothing memorable besides a proclamation published by the king against popish priests and jesuits, and to prohibit his majesty's subjects resorting to popish chapels, on pain of prosecution. This was meant as a sweetener to the parliament, which was to meet in the beginning of the following year. But before I close my account of the present, I must take notice of an affair which, though of little consequence in itself, serves strongly to mark the character of the nation, and the spirit of Charles's administration. The freedom of the government, and the number as well as animosity of the parties, had produced a propensity for political disputes: and as the coffee-houses were the chief scenes where the measures of the king and his ministers were examined with the greatest severity, a proclamation was published to suppress these places of rendezvous, for which the nation had long entertained a particular fondness.

Such an act of power, about seventy years before, would have been grounded entirely on the prerogative; and no difficulty would have been made in submitting to that stretch of authority. But Charles, hearing that some exceptions were taken to his proclamation, applied to the judges, who furnished him with a quirk of law, and that too a very ridiculous one, by which he might vindicate his conduct.

The act which established the excise, invested the king with a power to refuse licences for retailing liquors to such as could not give security for payment of the duties. But coffee was not an exciseable liquor; and even this power of refusing licences was very confined, and could not justly be stretched beyond the intention of the act. The king therefore, afraid of inflaming the resentment of the people, complied with a petition of the coffee-men, who engaged for the future to prevent vent all seditious discourse in their houses; and the proclamation was recalled*.

This year died George Digby, earl of Bristol, aged seventy-five, the same who negotiated the Spanish matters in the last reign, and whom we have so often had occasion to mention in the course of this history.

The people of England, grieved at the evident partiality their sovereign shewed for the interest of France, and incensed by the insolence and piracies of that nation, were eager to revenge the injuries they had received by an open war; and waited with impatience for the assembling of the parliament, from whom they expected a greater attention to the interests and honour of the kingdom than the king appeared disposed to shew.

That august assembly met on the fifteenth of February, 1677, the day they stood prorogued to, and was opened by a speech from the throne, and another from the lord-chancellor Finch; the purport of both which was, to recommend unanimity, to set the king's conduct in the fairest light, and to press a supply, assuring them that his majesty was really necessitous, and concluding with promising, that he was ready to give them all possible satisfaction in regard to the security of their religion, liberties, and properties. The commons were no sooner withdrawn from the house of lords, than the duke of Buckingham, standing up, began a long and florid speech, in which he undertook to prove that the parliament was dissolved by the last prorogation, in consequence of a statute of Edward III. importing, "That a parliament should be held once a year, or oftener if need be." From whence he inferred, that a prorogation for above a year (this had been near fifteen months) was void, and consequently they could not act by virtue of such prorogation, but a new parliament must be elected. This was the constant drift of the Country Party, who could not with any temper perceive the court possessed of so great a majority in both houses. The duke was seconded by the earls of Shaftesbury, Salisbury, and the lord Wharton. Their arguments produced violent debates; but as they tended towards an abolition of all that had been transacted in this parliament, and opened a door to sedition and anarchy, those four noblemen were sent to the Tower, from whence they were released soon after, on making their submissions, and acknowledging their errors, except Shaftesbury, who remained in confinement above twelve months.

The parliament, at its first proceeding to business, acted as if it had laid aside those unhappy heats and animosities which had troubled its debates, and infected its councils, for the two preceding sessions. The commons voted his majesty near six hundred thousand pounds for the use of the navy, and a continuance of the additional excise upon ale and brandy for three years: in fine, every thing seemed to promise a happy union between the king and his parliament; but these halcyon days were not of long duration. The rapid progress which the French king continued to make on the continent, filled the parliament with the most just apprehensions. Lewis had taken the field in the month of January this year, and invested Valenciennes, which he took by assault in a few days. His general Luxemburg had beaten the prince of Orange before St. Omers; which town, with Cambray, yielded to the victors.

It was evident to all Europe that Charles had it in his power to give it peace whenever he pleased, by declaring war against France, unless she would lay down her arms and accept of reasonable terms; and the allies were at once ashamed and incensed at the partiality with which he acted the part of a mediator. His own people were penetrated with the same sentiments, and saw with regret their honour and their interest sacrificed to motives of avarice and ill policy. The representatives of the people, thinking they could not, consistent with their duty, longer keep silence, drew up the following address to the king:

"We your majesty's most loyal subjects do most humbly offer to your majesty's consideration, that the minds of your people are disquieted with the manifest dangers arising to your majesty by the growth and power of the French king; especially by the acquisitions already made, and the farther progress like to be made by him in the Spanish Netherlands; in the preservation and security whereof, we humbly conceive the interest of your majesty, and the safety of your people, are highly concerned: and therefore we humbly beseech your majesty to take the same into your royal care, and to strengthen yourself with such stricter alliance as may secure your majesty's kingdoms, and secure and preserve the said Spanish Netherlands, and thereby to quiet the minds of your majesty's people."

The king answering only in general terms, the commons resolved to be more particular, and addressed his majesty a second time, beseeching him, "That he would not delay to contract such alliances as might be requisite for stopping the progress of the French arms: and in case a war with France should be the consequence of his measures, they engaged to furnish him with such supplies as should be necessary for maintaining the honour and interest of the nation."

Charles plainly perceived their drift, and was resolved to make his own advantage of it. Accordingly, he sent them a message about ten days after, wherein he told them, That the best method for consulting the safety of the kingdom, would be to enable him to put it in a proper posture of defence; and for this purpose demanded a supply of six hundred thousand pounds, without which, he said, it would not be possible for him to speak or act those things which should answer the end of their several addresses. The commons, however, excused themselves from giving any more money at this time; but said, if his majesty would form alliances in the mean time, in pursuance of their former addresses, they would enable him to make them good at their next meeting. Whereupon the king came to the house on the sixteenth of April; and after giving his assent to the money-bill and some others, adjourned the parliament to the twenty-fourth of May. The two houses met on that day, and the commons still refused to give money before some vigorous measures should be set on foot against the French. They hoped, they said, some alliances would have been formed for that purpose during their recess, and then they would cheerfully have granted supplies; they next took upon them to point out to his majesty what alliances they thought the most proper for him to make, particularly instancing a league offensive and defensive with the States-General; and concluded with observing, that when these steps were taken, they would furnish him from time to time with such sums as might preserve the honour of the crown, and the safety of the people. Charles was (certainly not without reason) highly nettled at such a barefaced encroachment on the royal prerogative of making peace and war, as dictating to him in so peremptory a manner what kind of alliances he should make. He therefore sent for the commons to the Banqueting-house; and after reprimanding them for the affront they had put on him, he ordered them to adjourn themselves to the sixteenth of July. In this dispute between the king and the parliament, both sides seem to have been in fault: the commons, by being wanting in that respect which should ever be shewed to royal characters, the least of whose acknowledged and lawful prerogatives are and ought to be held inviolably sacred. On the other hand, it appears from the whole tenor of Charles's conduct, that he had at this time no other view than that of procuring a sum of money: and as he was all along cajoled by the court of France, with promises of assistance to make himself absolute, and change the established religion; on this supposition, instead of being concerned to stop the progress of France, it could not but be his interest that she should grow more powerful; a scheme in which he too well succeeded, and must for ever, if not render his memory odious, at least silence the tongues of his admirers.

All this time the negotiations were continued between France and Holland, and an eventual treaty was concluded; that is, all their differences were compromised, provided they could afterwards give satisfaction to their allies. But this work, tho' extremely difficult, seemed to be much facilitated by the farther losses of the confederates, and the great impotence of the Dutch, when an event happened which promised a more prosperous issue to the war with France, and an entire change in the English councils.

Charles, finding that the prince of Orange, in order to maintain himself in authority, and acquire opportunities of raising his military fame, strongly opposed every step towards a separate peace, sent for sir William Temple from Nimeguen soon after the rising of the parliament; and having complained to him of the usage he received from the Country Party, who were for pressing him into a war with France, he directed him to acquaint the prince of Orange from him, that he was extremely desirous an end might be put to the war as soon as possible; with assurances that his majesty would concur with the prince in insisting on such terms as might be acceptable to Holland as well as England; and at the same time to invite the prince over to England, to put the finishing hand to the match which he had solicited for himself some time past with the princess Mary, eldest daughter of his royal highness the duke of York; for the completion of which, the king gave his royal word that he would exert all his influence and authority with his brother.

The prince, lulled by these flattering promises, came over to England in the beginning of October, and prosecuted his addresses with great warmth to the princess, then in the bloom of youth, about fifteen years of age, and a most agreeable young lady. The courtship was not of long duration, the marriage being celebrated on the fourth of November following, and soon after the prince embarked with his consort for Holland.

During his stay here, every tentative was used to bring him into the scheme for a separate peace; but he would not engage in any discourse on that subject, alleging, that as the allies were like to have hard terms, they would be apt to think he had made his match at their cost, and that he would never have it imputed to him that he had sold his honour for a wife. The truth is, there was much more of policy than love in this match: nor is it improbable that the prince of Orange, finding the general bent of the nation against the succession of a Roman catholic, might even at this time have a prospect of mounting the throne of England. This much is certain, that the duke of York shewed great reluctance in giving his consent to this match; not that he would deny the prince of Orange to be worthy of his alliance, as well on account of his descent from one of the most illustrious houses in Europe, as of his own personal great qualities: but James had a certain foreboding of what would happen to him afterwards thro' his son-in-law, and in this he was more clear-sighted than his brother Charles, who could not perceive in the physiognomy of his nephew aught that portended evil to him or his family. Happily he did not live to be convinced of his mistake.

The French ministry, who had foreseen the efforts their enemies would make to bring the English court to their interests, had not been negligent in providing against such an event. They had for some time retained Charles and his courtiers as pensioners; the latter, dazzled by the shining metal, took care to encourage Charles in his partiality to their benefactor; so that Lewis XIV. at the same time that he humbled his enemies by the sword, kept the English court in an abject submission to his will, by charming the eyes of its sovereign with those treasures of which he was so fond, for no other purpose but to bestow them on the ministers of his riotous pleasures. Lewis, however, sensible of the levity and inconstancy of the English monarch, was afraid that sooner or later he might have his eyes opened to his true interest, and, regardless of his honour, shake off the inglorious servitude he now kept him in, and vigorously join with the confederate powers to prescribe limits to the ambition of France. He therefore endeavoured to persuade him to dismiss part of the troops he kept in constant pay; and Mr. Barillon, who resided here as ambassador from the French court, had orders to leave nothing undone to bring Charles to consent to his scheme: and in order to dispose him the more readily thereto, he was to offer a renewal of the former treaty between the two kings, without any other condition than that of Charles engaging to keep no more than eight thousand troops in pay. Charles was not so blinded by his passions but that he felt all the infamy infamy of this proposal: and when the ambassador delivered the message, he was answered with great anger: "How! is it thus my brother of France means to deal by me? are these the fruits of all his mighty promises to make me absolute in my kingdom? or does he think it is to be done by eight thousand men?"

It is really difficult to comprehend how Charles, who was actually endowed with great penetration, and no small share of understanding; and his council, who passed for some of the ablest heads in Europe, could have been so long the dupes of French finesse. Lewis knew and acknowledged that the pension he paid the king of England was in itself but trifling; but he had prevailed on him to content himself for the present, till he could amply repay him for his forbearance, by rendering him absolute over his subjects. Thus for a long time did Charles continue to depend upon airy promises; nor was he perfectly convinced of the insincerity of them till after the peace of Nimeguen, when his dear friend and ally, having his arms at liberty, soon shewed himself as prompt in forgetting, as he had been warm in forming engagements.

The reader will excuse this digression, which the reflection on Charles's circumstances and conduct insensibly led me into. I return:

Immediately after the conclusion of the prince of Orange's marriage, the king had entered into conferences with him concerning the plan of a general pacification, at which the earl of Danby and sir William Temple assisted. After some dispute, it was agreed that Lewis should restore all he had taken from the emperor and the duke of Lorraine; that there should be a mutual restitution between France and Holland; and that Spain should recover possession of Aeth, Oudenarde, Charleroi, Courtray, Tournay, Condé, Valenciennes, Saint Guillaïn, and Binch. The prince proposed that Franche-comté should likewise be restored; but Charles representing the impossibility of compelling Lewis to resign Franche-comté, the prince thought proper to submit, and even engaged to use his endeavours in persuading the States to agree to these conditions; while Charles, on his part, undertook to procure the consent of the French monarch, declaring at the same time, that he would never recede in the least article from the scheme concerted, but proclaim war against Lewis if he refused it; and with this assurance the prince left England.

The earl of Feversham, a creature of the duke of York, and a Frenchman by birth*, was sent as ambassador to Paris with intimation of this agreement; which, tho' it must have been extremely disagreeable to Lewis, he received with seeming complacency and contentment. He told Feversham, that the king knew he might always command a peace; but some of the towns in Flanders it seemed very hard to demand, especially Tournay, upon the fortifications of which he had expended large sums of money: he hoped his brother would not break with him for one or two towns; and even with regard to these, he would send orders to his ambassador at London to treat with the king himself; thus the blow was artfully eluded†.

Charles, however, piqued at the insincerity of the French court, resolved to let Lewis see that he was not to be insulted with impunity. The meeting of the parliament, which stood prorogued to May, was anticipated to the fifteenth of January, 1678; a very uncommon measure, and such as gave no little alarm to Lewis. In the mean time Laurence Hyde, second son to the late chancellor Clarendon, was sent to Holland to conclude a treaty of alliance with the States, in the nature of the triple league, to compel both France and Spain to agree to the terms concerted.

When the English parliament met, the king told them in a speech from the throne, That as he saw there was little probability of procuring a good peace by conferences and negotiations, he was determined to undertake a war for that purpose, but that it was necessary they granted him a supply adequate to the occasion; assuring them, that they might depend on the money being appropriated to that end. The commons having taken the king's speech into consideration, agreed upon an address to his majesty; wherein they thanked him for his care and encouragement of the protestant religion, by marrying his niece to the prince of Orange, intreating him that he would consent to no peace with France, but upon the Pyrenean treaty; and that neither England nor the confederates should be suffered to trade with France during the war, promising his majesty to assist him in the prosecution of it, when he should impart to them his alliances with the confederates.

The king resented this address as a repetition of the encroachment they had made on the royal prerogative in the former session, and sent them a very sharp answer. The commons, however, instead of replying to it, immediately went upon the supply, and resolved on a poll-tax, appropriating the money to the service of the French war; and added a clause, whereby all trade with France was prohibited for three years.

In the mean time, the French king taking the field early in the spring, reduced Ghent and Ypres, and distributed his troops in quarters of refreshment. This progress alarmed the Dutch in such a manner, that they resolved to conclude a separate peace. Lewis knowing his own advantage, and that he had nothing to fear from the king of England, talked in the strain of a conqueror, and insisted upon terms very different from those which had been planned by Charles and the prince of Orange. In April the chancellor told the two houses in the king's name, That the Dutch certainly intended to conclude a separate peace with France, and his majesty demanded their advice on that subject. The commons exhorted him to declare war against France; then they voted the alliance with Holland not answerable to their address, nor sufficient for the security of the kingdom. Charles expressed his dissatisfaction at this vote; notwithstanding which, they presented another address, desiring to know the resolutions he had taken in consequence of their advice; that he would pay more attention to their addresses; and that he would remove the duke of Lauderdale from his councils. The king replied, That he was surprized at the extravagance of their address, to which at present he would not make the answer it deserved. As they had already passed a poll-tax for the service of the year, he began to make levies, which were carried on with such surprising diligence and success, that in six weeks time an army of thirty thousand men was compleated. The duke of Monmouth was sent over with three thousand to garrison Ostend; a fleet was equipped; and the court breathed nothing but defiance against the French monarch.

The parliament meeting again on the twenty-seventh of May, after an adjournment of twelve days, began to give evident signs of their distrusting the king's sincerity in the levies he had lately made, and came to the following resolution: "That the house taking into consideration the state of the nation, and the expence occasioned by the army, were humbly of opinion, that if his majesty pleased to think fit to enter into the war against the French king, the house was and would be ready to assist him in that war; but if otherwise, they would proceed to the consideration of providing for the speedy disbanding of the army."

The house further ordered, that the members of his majesty's privy-council should acquaint the king with this vote, and to pray his speedy answer. The king answered, "That the French king having offered a cessation till the twenty-seventh of July, there was great likelihood that it would be accepted, and end in a general peace; but that it was his opinion the army should not be disbanded before that time." Upon this answer, the house voted, "That all forces raised since the twenty-ninth of September last (excepting those transported to foreign plantations) be forthwith paid off and disbanded, and that they would consider of a supply for that purpose." Accordingly, the fourth of June, the house voted two hundred thousand pounds for the disbanding of the army by the end of the month; and the next day they voted the same sum towards defraying the expences of the fleet.

Upon these votes, the king sent a message to the house, representing the danger of taking such a step before the conclusion of the peace; and he asked them, whether he could honourably abandon those powers in Flanders which had put themselves under his protection, and which at present depended solely on him for their safety? The commons then agreed to prolong the term with regard to the forces in Flanders to the twenty-seventh day of July.

The fifteenth of June the house resolved, "That after the Tuesday following, no motion should be made for any supply of money, till after the next recess." As hitherto the house had experienced that the king only amused them, and aimed to get the money before he positively declared his intention, they now resolved to put him under a necessity of declaring within three days, for fear of being still amused by him till the opportunity was lost.

On that very Tuesday, June 18, the king came to the house of peers; and sending for the commons, made a speech to both houses; in which he told them, "That the peace between France, Spain, and Holland, was almost as good as concluded. He said the Spaniards had positively declared they were not able to bear the expence of maintaining garrisons in Flanders, which must be left exposed, unless England would undertake to support the fortifications. He therefore observed, it would be necessary to keep a good fleet at sea, and in particular to provide for the safety of Ostend, where otherwise the French might maintain a fleet of forty ships of war exactly opposite to the mouth of the Thames. If they desired he should live in strict union with his parliament, they would make an addition of three hundred thousand pounds to his revenue: in which case, they might bring in a bill for appropriating fifty thousand yearly to the support of the fleets and artillery; and then he would be always ready to pass whatever acts should be proposed for the benefit of the nation. Finally, he desired they would remember that he had engaged to pay forty thousand pounds for the portion of the princess Mary; that the first moiety was already due, and demanded by the prince of Orange."

By this speech of Charles, one would be led to imagine that he had performed every thing for the nation that could be asked of a sovereign, anxious for the welfare of his people, and jealous of the honour and majesty of his crown; but his parliament was too well accustomed to such kind of speeches to suffer this to make any impression upon them. They were convinced that it was in the king's power to procure all that he should think proper to demand of France; and they were as well convinced that he was linked in a fatal connection with that court, which would not suffer him to fulfil the wishes of the nation, and perhaps the dictates of his own reason. The commons indeed voted his majesty their thanks for the gracious expressions in his speech; but they would not grant him any additional revenue, or even make him satisfaction for the losses he had sustained in the customs, by the prohibition of the French trade: and when the lords made an amendment to the bill for disbanding the army, by enlarging the time a month longer, the commons would not consent to it. Whereupon his majesty came to the house on the fifteenth of July, and prorogued them to the first of August.* Let us now return to the negotiations for peace abroad.

Van Beverning was the Dutch plenipotentiary at Nimeguen, a man of great ability and address. The States General, convinced that there were little hopes of receiving any assistance from England, considering the disposition of the king, and the jealousies of the parliament, ordered their minister to repair to the French king at Ghent, and settle a separate peace with him, on condition he agreed to restore the six following towns to the Spaniards, viz. Ghent, Aeth, Charleroi, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburgh; but the French king positively refused to evacuate them till he saw an entire restitution made to his allies the Swedes, of all they had lost in the war.

The states immediately acquainted Charles with this refusal of the French king; and he was so incensed at this conduct of Lewis, that he sent Temple forthwith to Holland, in order to concert an effectual plan for opposing the ambition of France. In six days Temple concluded a treaty with the States to carry on the war jointly with them against France, if the aforesaid towns were not evacuated within sixteen days after the date of the treaty, which was signed on the twenty-sixth of July; and the prince of Orange being joined by the English auxiliaries under the duke of Monmouth, marched to the relief of Mons, which was then blocked up by marshal Luxemburg. This appearance of unusual vigor on the part of the English court had such an influence on the French ministers, that on the morning of the critical day which was to determine peace or war for Europe, they waited on Van Beverning, and told him they were willing to agree to the restitution of the towns, and to conclude and sign the peace. The articles were accordingly drawn and signed, just as the clock struck twelve at night, by the ministers of France and Holland. By this treaty, concluded the tenth of August, 1678, it was agreed, That each party should retain what they were respectively possessed of, only the French were to restore Maestricht, with its dependencies, to the Dutch, which was all the French retained of their conquests in the United Provinces: and by a separate article, all the territories belonging to the prince of Orange in France, Franche-comté, Charleroi, Flanders, &c. were restored to him.

The Spaniards, on their part, thought fit to accept of the conditions of peace the English and Dutch had procured for them, and their plenipotentiaries signed the treaty the latter end of September, as did the Germans the third of February following*. Thus all the confederates in a few months enjoyed the benefit of a pacification, except the duke of Lorraine, who was not restored to his dominions.

The prince of Orange, who was greatly dissatisfied with this peace, took a very extraordinary step, with a view to embroil matters again, if possible, or perhaps to express his resentment against Lewis, to whom he bore a particular hatred. Marshal Luxemburg, who was then besieging Mons, had lately received an account of the conclusion of the peace; upon which he lay lulled in full security in the village of St. Denis. The prince of Orange, with his whole army that had marched to the relief of Mons, attacking the marshal's quarters and forces therein, a long and bloody engagement ensued, and the prince gained a considerable advantage over the marshal, who could with great difficulty resist the fury of this attack. The prince of Orange remained master of the field of battle; indeed he had the greatest reason to expect the most complete victory: for he not only gave the attack, which is a great advantage, but he attacked an army which, depending on the faith of treaties, had grown remiss in their military strictness.

On this transaction a celebrated French writer † has the following judicious and elegant remark: "Did ambitious men pay any regard to their fellow-creatures, the prince of Orange would not have fought this battle. He certainly knew that the peace was already signed, or on the point of being so; he knew that this peace would prove advantageous to his country, and yet he hazarded his own life, and that of thousands of men besides, as the first-fruits of a general peace, which was then so far advanced, that had he even beat the French army, it would have made no alteration in the congress. This act, inhuman as it was glorious, and which at that time was more esteemed than blamed, did not produce one single additional article in the treaty; and the lives of two thousand French, and as many of the enemy, were thrown away to no end."

This peace furnishes us with a memorable instance how much projects are contradicted by events. Holland, against whom alone the war was undertaken, and whose destruction seemed inevitable, lost nothing at all; on the contrary, she gained a barrier, while every other power that had interposed to snatch her from destruction, saw themselves considerable losers, and were obliged to accept the terms presented to them by France and Holland. It may, as Mr. Rapin very justly observes, be affirmed with great truth, that it was the king of England's fault alone that Europe had not a more advantageous peace, since the parliament was ready to grant plentifully all the necessary supplies, would Charles have acted agreeable either to the interests of Europe in general, or of England in particular. This conduct can only be ascribed to his passion for executing his darling scheme of rendering himself absolute master of his people. As for the other design with which he is charged by that writer and many others, of introducing the popish religion into England, I am far from being convinced in my own mind that he really entertained such a thought. All religions were alike to Charles, and the concessions which he made in favour of the catholics, seem rather to have been the effect of his love for his brother, and ready compliance with any counsels which he adopted, than his own attachment to that particular mode of faith. As I have observed elsewhere, it was all one to him whether popery or protestantism were the religion of England, so that he could but enjoy his beloved ease and pleasure.

This year, 1678, was distinguished by the discovery of the famous conspiracy in England, known by the name of the Popish Plot, which for a considerable time engrossed the whole attention of the legislature, and has given occasion to many politicians to exercise their talents in supporting the truth, or exposing the falsity of it, as they were attached to one or the other party. The whole of this affair is indeed so replete with contradictions, that I should puzzle my reader, as well as myself, was I to attempt the unravelling them. I shall

* By the treaty between France and Spain, dated the seventeenth of September, 1678, the French agreed to restore to the Spaniards, Charleroi, Aeth, Oudenard, and Courtray, the city and duchy of Limburgh, Ghent, the country of Waes, Lewe, St. Guillaing, and Puicerda, and all the places they had taken in Sicily. On the other hand, it was agreed that the French should retain the county of Burgundy, or Franche-comté, the towns of Valenciennes, Bouchain, Condé, Cambray, Tour-

therefore content myself with a plain narrative of facts, as handed down to us by the best authorities, and leave every one to draw such conclusions as he may think most agreeable to reason and sound sense.

It is said then, that the design of this conspiracy was to kill the king, to subvert the government, to extirpate the protestant religion, and establish popery. The authors and promoters of it were said to be the pope and cardinals, the Romish, French, Spanish, and English jesuits, the seminary priests in England, who at this time came over in great numbers, and several popish lords *, and others of that party. The duke of York himself was deeply suspected of being concerned in it, all but that part relating to killing the king; and, that point excepted, the king himself was supposed to have favoured it, out of revenge to the French king, who had so infamously deceived him; and as he found he could not any other way hurt Lewis, he thought to give him a sensible mortification, by encouraging a persecution against those of his faith, to which he knew he was a great bigot. The article of taking off the king seems to be only the project of a part of the conspirators, to make way for the duke of York to ascend the throne, who was more forward, active, and less fearful than the king, and consequently more likely to bring the grand design of the conspiracy, the changing the government and religion, to a speedier conclusion.

The chief discoverer of this conspiracy was Titus Oates †, who having been a clergyman of the church of England, reconciled himself to the church of Rome, or pretended at least so to do, and entered into the number of the English seminarists at St. Omer's. He also went into Spain, and was admitted to the councils of the jesuits. By these means he is said to have got acquainted with all the secret designs that were carrying on, in order to establish popery in this nation; and then returning to England, he digested the several matters he had heard into a narrative, and by the means of Dr. Tonge ‡, a city divine, got a copy of it delivered to the king §, who referred him to the lord-treasurer Danby.

It is probable that the two informers thought to make their fortunes by their discoveries; but finding that the king did not take much notice of it, they resolved to communicate it to the parliament; but first Oates went and made oath of the truth of the narrative before sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, a justice of the peace, and left one copy of it with him, reserving another for himself. And now the affair taking wind, it was resolved to bring it before the council, who sat twice a day for above a week together, to examine into it; and Tonge and Oates had lodgings assigned them in Whitehall, with a handsome provision to each for their maintenance, and a guard for the security of their persons. Upon their informations, which they threw out by wholesale, several persons were apprehended, as, Wakeman, the queen's physician; Coleman, the duke of York's secretary; and eight priests or jesuits. In Coleman's house were found several letters which seemed to concur with Oates's testimony, and gave great weight to what he advanced. This, with the murder of sir Edmundsbury Godfrey soon after, who had sworn Oates to his narrative, confirmed the people in their belief of the plot.

Godfrey had been remarkably active in his office against the papists, to whom his murder was immediately ascribed; and the truth was confirmed beyond a possibility of doubt, in the opinion of the multitude, by the evidence of Bedloe § and Prance; the latter of whom deposed that he, with Green, Berry, Hill, and some others, dogged the justice for some time, till they got him into Somerset-House, where they strangled him with an handkerchief; that they afterwards carried the body, and laid it in a ditch near Primrose-hill, after having thrust his own sword thro' it, in which condition they left him: and indeed when the body was found, it appeared plainly that he had been strangled ¶. Green, Berry, and Hill, were afterwards condemned and executed for the murder, but denied the fact to the last.

* The lord viscount Stafford, the lords Arundel, Bellasis, and others.

† Echard gives us the following account of this man: "This Oates was the son of a ribband-weaver, who afterwards turning anabaptist-preacher, and being chaplain to a regiment of Cromwell's forces in Scotland, was there clapt up in prison upon Overton's plot against that usurper; but having the good fortune to escape upon the king's restoration, he conformed to the church, and got the living of Hastings in Sussex, where he continued till he thought fit to return to his former anabaptistical station. This son of his had his first education in Merchant-Taylors school in London, and next in the university at Cambridge, where he was student in two colleges, Caius's and St. John's, and where he left no reputation behind him for his parts or learning, though he seemed distinguished for a tenacious memory, a plodding industry, and an unparalleled assurance, besides a particular canting way that appeared in his academical exercises. Removing thence, he stepped into orders, and for a while officiated as curate for his father; after which he enjoyed a small vicarage in Kent, from whence he removed to another in Sussex; and after that for some time got into the duke of Norfolk's family, when he particularly sided with the Socinians at London; so that he became very uncertain as to his principles and religion, and infamous as to his morals."

‡ The same author tells, "That Tonge was a man of letters, and a prolific head, filled with all the Romish plots and conspiracies since the Reformation. This man was remarkable for his parts and great reading, but of a restless and humorous temper, full of variety of projects, and scarce ever without a pen in his hand, and a plot in his head."

§ On the twelfth of August (the day after signing the treaty of Nimeguen) Dr. Tonge applied himself to one Kirby, a chemist, that was for some time in the king's laboratory, and who had some interest at court, to desire the king might be acquainted that he had an information to lay before him, of a plot carrying on against his person. Kirby took the opportunity of the king's walking in St. James's Park the very next day, to discharge his commission, and was ordered to bring Tonge before him at eight that evening. Tonge was at Whitehall at the appointed hour, and put into the king's hand a writing or narrative, which in forty-three articles contained the particulars of a plot. The king, after a negligent perusal of it, told Tonge that he was going to Windsor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the lord-treasurer Danby, on whom he ordered him to wait the next morning: Rapin.

§ Bedloe was at first a menial servant to the lord Bellasis; afterwards going abroad and serving in the wars, he assumed the title of captain; his character in general was bad. Prance was a goldsmith of London: he recanted his evidence two or three times.

¶ The bishops Lloyd and Burnet went to view the body; and besides the circumstances above mentioned, observed that his shoes were clean, a mark round his neck an inch broad, his breast all over bruised, and his neck broken. There were many drops of white wax-light upon his breeches, which he never used himself: and since only persons of quality and priests use those lights, this made all people conclude in whose hands he must have been. Burnet.

The plot was first discovered in August, sir Edmundsbury Godfrey was murdered in the beginning of October, and the parliament met on the twenty-first. It appears from the joint testimony of contemporary writers, that the king shewed great unwillingness to have the parliament take cognizance of the plot. He was obliged to take some notice of an affair which was the topic of every conversation, and had filled the minds of all ranks of people with fear and apprehension; but in his speech to the two houses at their meeting, he said "he would forbear giving any opinion of the matter, lest he should say too much or too little, and that he would leave the discussion of it entirely to the law."

But Danby, either afraid of being called to an account, should he conceal an affair of so much importance that had passed through his hands, or desirous to ingratiate himself with the parliament, in which he had so many enemies, disconcerted all the king's measures by opening the matter to the house of lords. The king afterwards reprimanded the treasurer with great severity for this hasty step, which is a clear proof that it was contrary to his designs: possibly he thought he had already gone far enough in his revenge upon the French king, and was desirous of stopping the prosecution against the catholics before it grew too violent.

The lords communicated the intelligence to the commons; and both houses entered so warmly into the matter, that for several days they sat from morning till night examining Oates and other witnesses. At length, on the thirty-first of October, they resolved nem. con. "That the lords and commons are of opinion, that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, contrived and carried on by popish recusants, for assassinating and murdering the king, for subverting the government, and for rooting out and destroying the protestant religion."

It was about this time that Bedloe made his appearance as an evidence for the plot, and was examined by the lords. In the mean time, the commons ordered several persons, whom Oates had sworn against, to be apprehended; and among others the following noblemen, who were declared papists, the earl of Powis, the lord viscount Stafford, and the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bellasis, who were sent to the Tower.

The depositions of Oates and Bedloe being published, excited such a ferment in the nation, that the king was obliged to issue a proclamation, commanding all popish recusants, under the severest penalties, to repair to their own houses, and not to venture from thence, without a particular licence, to a greater distance than five miles. At the same time another proclamation was published, offering a reward to any one who should discover or apprehend a Romish priest or jesuit; and a bill, which had lately passed the two houses, disabling all papists from sitting in parliament, received the royal assent. Not contented with this, the commons finding that sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of Scotland, had countersigned several commissions to popish recusants, for this offence, as a member of the lower house, committed him to the Tower. The king was greatly incensed at this commitment of his servant, without application first made to him, and he instantly ordered him to be released: however, he revoked the commissions that had given offence, and there the affair dropt.

The late vigorous measures taken by the commons against the papists, were only preparatory to the execution of a project which they had already formed, of excluding the duke of York from the succession, as appears by their permitting a debate to arise in the house for an address to remove the said duke from his majesty's presence and councils, which was put off to another day; and in the mean time the king came to the house, and in a speech told them, that he would consent to any bills for their security in the reign of his successor, so that they tended not to impede the right of succession, nor the descent of the crown in the true line; and Charles stuck to this on all the attempts that were afterwards made for a bill of exclusion.

The next object that engrossed the attention of the public was the trial and condemnation of the conspirators. Coleman, the duke's secretary, was the first that was tried. On the twenty-seventh of November he was brought to the bar of the King's Bench, before the lord chief-justice Scroggs, where, upon the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, and his own letters, he was found guilty of high-treason, and executed on the third of December. It must be confessed that Coleman's letters sufficiently prove how much the king and duke were under a French and popish influence*. Other persons executed for the plot the beginning of the following year and the year after, were, William Ireland and Thomas Pickering, both priests; John Grove, a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread, provincial of the jesuits in England (who, according to the story of Oates and his party, was to have been created archbishop of Canterbury) and Harcourt, Fenwick, Gavan, and Turner, all jesuits likewise, and Langhorne, a popish lawyer. Besides Bedloe and Prance, one Dugdale was a witness

* Burnet says that Coleman had found leisure to convey all his papers out of the way, only he forgot a drawer under the table, in which the papers relating to the years 1674, 1675, and part of 1676, were left; these, being seized, contained many extraordinary passages. In particular, he wrote to father la Chaise (the French king's confessor) "We have here a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the utter subduing the pestilent heresy which has long domineered over a great part of this northern world. There were never such hopes of success, since the days of queen Mary, as in our days. God has given us a prince," meaning the duke, "who is become (may I say a miracle) zealous of being the author and instrument of so glorious a work; but the opposition we are sure to meet with is also like to be great: so that it imports us to get all the assistance we can."

In another letter he said, "I can scarce believe myself awake, or the thing real, when I think of a prince in such an age as we live in, converted to such a degree of zeal and piety, as not to regard any thing in comparison of God Almighty's glory, the salvation of his own soul, and the conversion of our poor kingdom." In other passages, he represents the interests of England, those of the French king, and those of the catholic religion, as intimately connected. The duke is also said to be unalterably attached to the interests of Lewis. The king himself, he asserts, is always disposed to favour the catholics, when he may do it with safety. "Money," says he in another letter, "is able to persuade the king to any thing. There is nothing it cannot make him do, were it ever so much to his prejudice. It hath such an absolute power over him, that he cannot resist it. Logic in our court built upon money, has more powerful charms than any other sort of argument." Burnet. Rapin. Hume.

against them; by whose evidence it appeared, that when they had killed the king, they were to lay it on the presbyterians.

The same day that Coleman was tried, the king, at the request of the lords, issued a proclamation, offering to any one who, before the twenty-fifth of December next, should make any farther discovery of the late horrid design against his majesty's person and government, a reward of two hundred pounds; and if the informer was even principal in the design, his majesty's most gracious pardon. Whether from a desire of gaining this reward, or from a conviction that they had good authority for what they advanced, Bedloe and one Grove had the boldness, before the king and council, to accuse the queen herself of being concerned in a design to poison him, by means of sir George Wakeman, his physician; but their depositions appearing vague and inconclusive, and the king interposing his absolute command to stop the prosecution of this affair, nothing farther came of it.

Thus much I have thought necessary to lay before my readers concerning this famous plot. Such of them as have leisure or inclination for examining the minuter circumstances of the several trials, with the weight of the evidences for and against the conspirators, will find the whole matter at large in the histories of Rapin, Burnet, and Echard, and the State Trials, from whence we have collected the above account. We are now to proceed to other matters.

Notwithstanding the appearance of attachment to the protestant religion assumed by Charles at this time, the generality of the nation, and the parliament in particular, were greatly disgusted with his conduct, both in civil and ecclesiastical affairs; and, wearied out with the continual breach of his promises, they resolved to leave nothing undone to cramp his power of doing harm. They were confirmed in this resolution by a transaction which transpired about this time, to the no small mortification of the king, and increase of the distrust the parliament had entertained of his principles.

It seems that Mr. Montagu, our ambassador in France, had aspired to the office of secretary of state, and was greatly incensed at the lord-treasurer Danby for having procured it for another. Montagu was sensible he had in his possession papers that might ruin Danby, and he resolved to make that use of them. With this view he wrote over to his friends here to get him elected for the county of Northampton, then vacant; and they having succeeded, he returned suddenly to England, without the knowledge or consent of the king, and took his seat in the house of commons. Charles suspecting his intention, gave orders for seizing his papers, under pretext of his having corresponded with the pope's nuncio while abroad; but Montagu had made sure of one paper which he knew was alone sufficient to answer his purpose: this he immediately produced in the house of commons. It was a letter from the treasurer Danby to Montagu, concerning the base negotiations in which Charles had engaged for selling his neutrality to the French king, during the war between that monarch and the allies*.

The commons were so exasperated, that they immediately impeached the earl of Danby of high treason, designing thereby to oblige him to plead the king's orders, who was more struck at in this proceeding than the treasurer. It is a justice done to the character of Danby to observe, that he was so unwilling to have any concern in this scandalous treaty, by which the interest of his country was sacrificed to the views of its most dangerous rival and enemy; that, in order to secure him from all danger, the king had with his own hand written the following words at the bottom of the duplicate of the letter: "This letter is written by my order. C. R." When this transaction came to be discovered, and the treasurer found the house had impeached him, he was in the utmost perplexity how to act. He did not chuse to accuse the king; and unless he pleaded his express order for the writing that letter, he knew his head must pay the forfeit of his compliance with the royal command. Charles was in as great a dilemma as himself: he dreaded to have the secret divulged, and therefore assured the earl of a pardon if he would stand between him and the attacks of the parliament. Danby consented to conceal his majesty's orders, and to defend himself in the best manner he could. In short, Danby exculpated himself so fully of having given any encouragement to the intrigues of the French ministry, as well as of other matters urged against him in the impeachment of the commons, that the lords refused to commit him to the Tower. The commons insisted upon his being taken into custody: a contest ensued between the two houses; and the king, dreading some fatal consequence from the violence of the commons, came to the house on the thirtieth of December, and prorogued the parliament. On the twenty-fourth of January following he dissolved it by proclamation, after it had sat near eighteen years, and, from the great extent of court influence among its members, had acquired the name of the Pensionary Parliament†. Soon after, writs were issued out for the electing a new parliament on the sixth of March.

Charles, to his great mortification, found that the ensuing parliament was likely to prove as little complaisant as the last; for the elections seemed to run against the crown, such persons only being returned as had distinguished themselves by their opposition to popery, and the extent of the regal prerogative. In order therefore to ingratiate himself as much as possible with the new assembly, he prevailed

* It was conceived in the following terms: "In case the conditions of peace shall be accepted, the king expects six millions of livres for three years, from the time that this agreement shall be signed between his majesty and the king of France; because it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in a humour to give him any supplies after the making of any peace with France; and the ambassador here has always agreed to that sum, but not for so long a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the money at all; and all possible care must be taken to keep this whole negotiation as private as possible, for fear of giving offence at home, where for the most part we hear in ten days after of any thing that is communicated to the French ministry." Burnet, Rapin.

† A modern historian has the following remark on this parliament; "Such was the conclusion of a parliament, which, one year excepted, had sat during the whole course of the present reign. The spirit which it had lately discovered was very different from that which it breathed in the beginning. Being elected during the joy and festivity of the Restoration, it was vailed on his brother the duke of York to submit to an order for his leaving England *. He took the treasurer's staff from Danby, and gave it to the earl of Lauderdale; but that the former might not, through resentment or fear, be tempted to discover secrets which he wished to have concealed, he granted him a free pardon under the great seal.

These concessions on the part of the king, instead of soothing the new parliament, which met on the sixth of March, 1679, rather encouraged them to fresh exertions of their power. The commons began by chusing Edward Seymour, Esq; for their speaker; a person whom they knew to be a professed enemy to the earl of Danby. The king knew it likewise, and refused his approbation to their choice, which occasioned a dispute between him and the commons, and a prorogation of a few days; when meeting again on the fifteenth, they chose Mr. Gregory, serjeant at law, for their speaker, who was approved of by the king. They presently resumed the affair of the earl of Danby, who chose to abide by his pardon, and withdrew himself. Whereupon they passed a vote to require him "to surrender himself to justice, on or before the twenty-third day of April next ensuing, on pain of being subjected to an act of attainder." Rather than be condemned unheard, Danby surrendered himself before the day to the usher of the black rod, and was committed to the Tower. A few days after he produced his pardon, and was remanded thither again. The commons declared this pardon to be illegal and void, and so he remained in the Tower till the year 1683.

The king, alarmed at the violence of the parliament, began to pursue such measures as he thought most likely to charm down the spirit of opposition which so strongly displayed itself. He offered sir William Temple, who had been recalled from his foreign employments, the office of one of the secretaries of state; but Temple, worn out with business, refused it; however, by his advice the king formed a new privy-council, into which were chosen several men of abilities, unconnected with the court, or such who were possessed of the chief influence in both houses †.

Charles assuredly thought that this alteration would have brought the commons into a more compliant humour; but he found himself grievously mistaken. The earl of Shaftesbury, though made president of the council, finding that he had actually lost the king's confidence, still adhered to the opposition, and employed all his art and intrigue to keep up the flame of animosity against the king and his brother. The house of one Bird being set on fire by his maid-servant, Elizabeth Oakley, she confessed she had been instigated to commit that crime by one Stubbs, a catholic; and he being questioned, owned that father Gifford, his confessor, had assured him there was no sin in burning the houses of heretics. He and Oakley declared, that the catholics in England intended to rise in arms, and expected to be joined by an army of sixty thousand men from France. The commons immediately addressed the king for the execution of Pickering and the other condemned jesuits. They even assembled on Sunday to concert measures for the preservation of the king's person, and the protestant religion, against the attempts of the papists. They brought in a bill for banishing all Roman catholics from London; and on the twenty-seventh of April, 1679, they resolved, "That the duke of York being a papist, and the hopes of his succeeding to the crown, has been the greatest encouragement to the present conspiracies, and designs of the papists, against the king and the protestant religion. This vote was sent to the lords by the lord Russel, eldest son of the earl of Bedford.

Hereupon the king, by the advice of his council, went to the house of peers, and proposed such limitations, in regard to the succession of a popish prince, as he thought would remove all objections; but these limitations, though very considerable, were not sufficient to satisfy the commons; and they resolved to rid themselves effectually of all their fears, by such a step as they thought could alone secure the liberties and religion of the nation. Accordingly, on the fifteenth of May, a bill was brought into the lower house, and there read for the first time, "To disable the duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown of England." This bill was commonly called The Bill of Exclusion; and as it was of so important a nature, I believe the reader will not be displeased to see the substance of it here.

The preamble set forth, "That the pope's emissaries had seduced James duke of York, the presumptive heir of the crown: that they had converted him to the catholic religion, and engaged him in several negotiations with the pope, his cardinals and nuncios, for the interest of that communion: that by his means they had increased the greatness of the French king, to the manifest danger of England: and that, by the accession of a popish prince to the throne, supported by foreign alliances, they would in time be enabled to accomplish their wicked purpose of destroying the liberty and religion of the kingdom."

composed almost entirely of royalists, who were disposed to support the crown with all the liberality which the habits of the age would permit.

"But many causes had since concurred to alienate their affections from his majesty. His open alliance with France, which was so inconsistent with the interest of the nation; his secret connections with that crown, which were equally pernicious and dishonourable; his two several Dutch wars, undertaken with the sole view of destroying that republic, the chief support of civil liberty; his dangerous designs, and even attempts, against the rights and privileges of his own subjects; his attachment to the catholic religion; his aversion to the protestants: these and many other circumstances tended to withdraw their confidence from the king, and to make them oppose him in all his measures." Hume's Hist. of Great Britain. Charles II.

* The duke however required, that his brother should satisfy him, as well as the nation, by a public declaration of the illegitimacy of the duke of Monmouth, a natural son of his majesty by Lucy Walters, and born about ten years before the Restoration. Being gratified in this request, he withdrew with his family to Brussels, where he took up his residence. Rapin. Hume.

† The names of the counsellors were, prince Rupert, the archbishop of Canterbury, lord Finch chancellor, the earl of Shaftesbury president, the earl of Anglesea privy-seal, the dukes of Albemarle, Monmouth, Newcastle, Lauderdale, Ormond, the marquisses of Winchester and Worcester, the earls of Arlington, Salisbury, Bridgewater, Sunderland, Essex, Bath, the viscounts of Falconbridge and Hallifax, the bishop of London, the lords Robarts, Hollis, Russel, and Cavendish, secretary Coventry, sir Francis North chief-justice, sir Henry Capel, sir John Erneley, sir Thomas Chicheley, Edward Seymour, and Henry Powle. Temple accepted of a place therein, in order to assist his prince in the present emergency. Rapin. Hume.

The bill then ordained, "That James, duke of York, Albany, and Ulster, should be incapable of inheriting the crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland: that, upon the death or resignation of the king, the sovereignty of these kingdoms should devolve to the person next in succession after the duke: that all acts of royalty which that prince should afterwards perform, should not only be void, but held treasonable: that if he entered any of these dominions, he should be deemed guilty of the same offence: and that all who supported his title should be punished as rebels and traitors."

This bill was read a second time on the twenty-first; and the question being put, Whether the bill should be committed? it passed in the affirmative by a very great majority (Yea's two hundred and seven, No's one hundred and twenty-eight.)

Charles perceiving by these, and some subsequent proceedings of the commons, that they only sought to drive things to extremity; and hearing, moreover, that they had a design to present to him a remonstrance, not much unlike that presented to the king his father in 1641, in order to inflame the nation against him, resolved to cut short their session. Accordingly he went to the house of peers on the twenty-seventh of May, and, sending for the commons, passed five bills; particularly one for the securing the liberty of the subject, called the HABEAS CORPUS act*, and then prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of August. By this means the Exclusion Bill was dropped for a time.

The opposition to the court was not confined to England alone. Here indeed the king had been pretty warmly attacked by parliamentary addresses: but the Scots, who were filled with the like spirit of discontent, had recourse to terms of a more efficacious kind. The earl of Lauderdale had governed them as high-commissioner for upwards of twelve years, during which time he had exercised a perfect tyranny over the people. He had been accused before the council of England by the duke of Hamilton, and several other noblemen, who brought unanswerable proofs of his maladministration; but the king, with whom he was in great favour, had stopped any rigorous proceedings against him, knowing that his age, and the infirmities consequent thereupon, must very soon render it necessary for him to resign; and his majesty had already destined his natural son the duke of Monmouth for his successor. The presbyterians or covenanters, however, whom he had in a particular manner oppressed, lost all patience; and, taking advantage of the distractions in England, resolved to right themselves by force of arms, and openly unfurled the ensigns of rebellion. Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrew's, was marked out a sacrifice to their first fury. If Burnet may be believed, he had been the foremost in the rank of their persecutors, and what rendered him particularly culpable in their eyes, was his having been formerly one of their party, and even sent as deputy by them to the English court at the Restoration, to take care of their interests there. He thought proper, however, whether from a motive of interest or conviction, to side with the court. On the removal of the episcopal order in Scotland, the archbishopric of St. Andrew's was bestowed upon him, and he ever after proved a heavy scourge to the presbyterians. They now thought the time was come to take full revenge on "this apostate, this betrayer of the godly, and persecutor of Christ's church;" epithets they had for a considerable time constantly designated this prelate. Accordingly, a body of them way-layed him as he was returning from the council at Edinburgh; and on the third of May, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, attacked his coach near a little country village called Magus, two miles distant from St. Andrew's, dragged him out of the carriage, and, regardless of the prayers and intercessions of his daughter, who happened to be with him, murdered him, with every imaginable circumstance of shocking brutality.

This assassination was celebrated by the covenanters as an exploit worthy the true servants of God, and served as a signal for their party to fly to arms; and on the twenty-ninth of the same month they began to assemble their forces, proclaimed the covenant at Rutherglen, surprized the city of Glasgow, issued out a proclamation, commanding the magistrates to turn out all archbishops, bishops, and curates, with their children and servants, within forty-eight hours; and inviting their brethren to join them, who readily espoused the good cause, they fell to plundering the adjacent country. Fortunately the ministry in Scotland found means to provide for the safety of Edinburgh; and the king no sooner heard of this insurrection, than he sent the duke of Monmouth, with a body of forces, into Scotland to suppress it. The duke being joined by the troops that had been raised in that kingdom to make head against the rebels, who were by this time seventeen thousand strong, marched incontinently to give them battle. He came up with them at Bothwell-bridge on the twenty-second of June; and falling on them with incredible fury, soon gained a complete victory. Near a thousand of the insurgents were left dead on the field, and about twelve hundred were taken prisoners. Among the latter were several of those concerned in the murder of the primate Sharpe, who were instantly hanged; a few more afterwards were tried and executed, and the rest transported. Those who escaped dispersed of themselves, and the public tranquility was perfectly restored.

Towards the latter end of August this year, the king was seized with so violent a fever, that in a very few days his life was by his physicians thought to be in danger. Hereupon it was resolved by the council, notwithstanding the strong opposition of Shaftesbury, their president, and others of the country party at that board, to send for the duke of York from Brussels, who, making a dispatch proportioned to the importance of the circumstance, arrived at Whitehall on the second of September;

* This act ordained, that no person should be sent prisoner beyond sea; that no judge, under the severest penalties, shall refuse to any prisoner a writ of Habeas corpus, by which the goaler is to produce in court the body of the prisoner (whence the writ has its name) and to certify the cause of his commitment and detainer: that, if the jail lie within twenty miles of the judge, the writs be obeyed in three days; and so proportionably for greater distances: that every prisoner be indicted the first term after his commitment, and brought to trial in the subsequent term; and that no man, after being discharged by order of court, be committed anew for the same offence. See stat. 31 Car. II.

The duke of York, during his stay at court, employed all his influence over the king his brother to set him against the duke of Monmouth. That young prince, who was possessed of many amiable qualities, was become extremely popular, and Shaftesbury and the Country Party had already singled him out as a proper person to fill the place of York in the succession to the crown, in case they could carry their favourite Exclusion Bill. Monmouth, elated with this flattering prospect, had been rather too free in his censures on the court measures. He had not spared at several different times to intimate to his friends, that he was the true and lawful son of Charles, who, according to him, had been solemnly married to his mother, Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of a country gentleman of that name. In short, his strict connection with the party in the opposition, and the indiscretion of his conduct and conversation, afforded but too plausible a supposition that he aspired to the crown. He was tenderly beloved by Charles; and it was not improbable that it was as much with a view to remove him out of the way of temptation, as from any compliance with the applications of his uncle, that the king, after taking from him his commission, and depriving him of several other employments he held under the crown, ordered him to withdraw to the continent; whereupon he embarked for Holland. The duke of York soon after went over to Brussels; and Shaftesbury, whose projects were now universally known, was dismissed from his place of president of the council. The duke of York did not remain long abroad; for thinking himself at too great a distance from the scene of his interests, he wrote a very submissive letter to the king, wherein he represented to his majesty, "That he conceived it, for many reasons, more proper for him to be in his majesty's dominions, rather than in those of another prince; and therefore made it his humble request to his majesty, that he would grant him his royal permission to go into Scotland." The king complied with his request; and James leaving Brussels, came to London about the beginning of November; and, after having paid his devoirs to his royal brother, he set out with his family for Edinburgh, and arrived there on the fourth of December. During his stay in Scotland, he made himself many more enemies than friends.

The elections for the new parliament running all against the court, the king, fearful that they would renew their attack against his brother, and traverse every measure he himself should chuse to adopt, determined to put off the session for a whole year, and accordingly signified this his intention to the council. The members, surprised at this resolution, and still more so at the peremptory manner in which it was made known to them, resolved to retire from court, nor longer fill the empty posts of counsellors that might not counsel. Essex resigned the office of treasurer, which was bestowed upon Lawrence Hyde, who, with Sunderland and Godolphin, became the king's chief counsellors. Lord Russell, one of the most popular and virtuous men in the nation, quitted the board, sir William Temple retired into the country, and Robert, earl of Radnor, was named president of the council.

Towards the latter end of October, about a fortnight after the parliament had been prorogued, a sham-plot was discovered, contrived by the papists, to be revenged on their persecutors, and to translate the odium from themselves to the presbyterians. One Dangerfield, a fellow who had suffered almost every punishment that the law can inflict on the most abandoned miscreant, and stood foremost in the chronicles of infamy, was tutored for the purpose. The catholic party released him out of Newgate, where he was imprisoned for debt, and set him to work. He pretended to have been privy to a design for destroying the king and the royal family, and converting the government into a commonwealth. The king and his brother countenanced the tale, and rewarded him for his discovery with a sum of money; but certain papers which he produced in evidence of his assertions, appearing upon examination to be forged by himself, he was put under arrest. All his haunts were ordered to be searched; and in the house of one Mrs. Cellier, a midwife, a Roman catholic, and an intimate of his, was found the model of the pretended plot, wrote very fair, and neatly made up into a book, tied with a ribband, and concealed in a meal-tub; whence it acquired the name of the MEAL-TUB plot. Finding himself thus detected, the incendiary made a full confession of the imposture, which he said had been contrived by the earl of Castlemain, the countess of Powis, and the five popish lords in the Tower, in order to invalidate the testimonies of Oates, Bedloe, and the rest, against the papists; and that he was to have accused the dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the earls of Essex, Halifax, and others, with being concerned in a conspiracy against the king and the duke of York. Upon this lord Castlemain and lady Powis were committed to the Tower; and the people did not spare to censure the king himself, as a promoter of this design against the lives and honours of those persons, who were well known to be obnoxious to him, but with what truth cannot now be determined by us.

Thus much, however, is certain, that the detection of this infamous juggle raised anew the storm against the catholics. The most irritating libels were dispersed thro' the kingdom: in London the mob, instigated, doubtless, by their superiors, carried about in procession the image of the murdered sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, crying out, that such would be the fate of every protestant, should a papist be suffered to succeed to the crown. Shaftesbury was at the bottom of all this, and had concerted matters so with the duke of Monmouth, that the latter came over to England without the king's leave, and arrived in the city just as these tumultuous doings were at the highest. The frantic demonstrations of joy that burst from the populace on the first notice of his return, the seditious pamphlets that immediately flew about, and in which the duke was represented as the only man that could deliver the nation from popery and slavery, sufficiently indicated a design to exclude the duke of York from the throne, and to set up Monmouth in his stead.

Such was the state of domestic affairs in England at the close of the year 1679. Many true lovers of their country beheld, with unspeakable grief, that animosity between the court and country parties, which seemed to threaten a renewal of the fatal year 1641: nor is it at all improbable that such might have been the case, if the king's necessities had, like those of his father, been so pressing, as to oblige him to assemble the parliament, as that unfortunate prince had done; had the Scots not been so effectually enslaved by a standing army which the court kept among them, that they had not power to stir; and had not the bishops and clergy, forgetting every other consideration in the pursuit of their interest, attached themselves so strongly to the court, as to give it a superiority over the opposition.

The nation by this time grew impatient at the long prorogation of the parliament. The country party took advantage of this, and by their emissaries procured a number of addresses to be sent from different parts of the kingdom, petitioning his majesty for the speedy assembling of the great council of the kingdom. The city of London distinguished itself on this occasion: sir Gilbert Gerard the lord-mayor, with several considerable citizens, went in a body to court, and presented a petition to the king, praying that he would give orders for the immediate meeting of the parliament, and that the popish lords might be brought to their trials. His majesty returned for answer, "That he looked upon himself to be the head of the government, and the only judge what was fit to be done in those causes."

This reply, however it may have been represented by some historians, too much biased by their own prejudices, was certainly well becoming the dignity and majesty of a sovereign: nor can we condemn Charles's conduct in this affair, when we reflect that numbers of the old rebel brood appeared at the head of the petitioners of the several counties.

The court party, however, thought it behoved them to use every precaution against this growing spirit of disaffection and opposition. They found means to have a number of counter-addresses sent up from the towns and boroughs in their interest, expressing the greatest abhorrence of such petitions, as an infringement upon the prerogative, which in their expressions they took care to advance as high as possible. Thus the nation came to be divided into Petitioners and Abhorrrers, soon known by the names of Whigs and Tories, which both parties, by way of reproach, gave each other, and which have so long served to characterise the different parties of this island*.

The king, however, thought fit to suffer the parliament to meet on the twenty-sixth day of January, 1680, the day they stood prorogued to; when he told them, That the distractions and jealousies of the kingdom were such, and so heightened by the malice and industry of ill-designing men, "that he was of opinion, a longer interval of parliament would be absolutely necessary for composing and quieting men's minds;" and therefore ordered them to be prorogued, at the same time giving them to understand, that it would be farther prorogued, unless the condition of his allies abroad required their immediate assistance.

And now the king determined to have the duke of York again near his person. Accordingly, he sent for him out of Scotland, and he arrived at court on the twenty-fourth of February. The city, by a strange inconsistent conduct, expressed the greatest joy at his return; invited the king his brother and him to a grand entertainment; and every street blazed with bonfires, every house shone with illuminations.

The Whigs were not a little mortified at the duke's return; and the earl of Shaftesbury, who was at the head of that party, and who had for some time been making a progress thro' the kingdom with Monmouth, in order to acquire him a powerful party among the populace, now took a step that bid fair to effectually ruin the duke of York, and establish the interests of his patron and pupil Monmouth. He industriously circulated a report of that nobleman's legitimacy, pretending that the king had been actually married to Mrs. Lucy Walters, or Barlow, the duke's mother; and that the contract of marriage was in a black box entrusted to the care of sir Gilbert Gerard. Such a report was of a nature not to be passed by on the part of the court and the duke of York. Sir Gilbert was examined before the council, and declared upon oath, that he never had such a contract in his possession, nor had ever heard that any such writing existed. Whereupon the king issued a declaration, importing, that he never was contracted to Mrs. Lucy Walters, or Barlow, mother to the duke of Monmouth, nor to any other woman but his royal consort queen Catherine. This declaration, attested by all the privy-counsellors, was registered in the Court of Chancery.

In Easter term this year, 1680, the countess of Powis being indicted of treason upon the evidence of Dangerfield, the jury brought in the bill, Ignoramus: whereupon the lord Stafford, one of the five popish lords confined in the Tower, thinking the credit of the plot and its witnesses began to decline, moved to be enlarged upon bail; but his suit was denied. In the summer, the earl of Castlemain and Cellier the midwife were tried on account of the Meal-Tub plot, and acquitted. The famous informer Bedloe died in August at Bristol, having on his death-bed signed a deposition before the lord chief-justice North, of the duke of York's being as much concerned in the popish plot as any one, excepting what related to the murder of the king.

Though the court party had of late gained ground, those in the opposition made strong efforts to retain their influence in the nation, in which they were not a little assisted by the favour of the city of London; which, notwithstanding the outward marks it had given of regard to the court, was in general averse to the administration. An opportunity offered about this time of giving a convincing proof of its real sentiments: sir Robert Clayton the mayor had, as usual, drank to a person, by way of nominating him sheriff, who happened not to be agreeable to the popular leaders. The common-council rejected the nomination, and

* The court party reproached their antagonists with their resemblance to the conventiclers in Scotland, who were commonly called Whigs; a name derived from a kind of butter-milk, upon which the covenanters were supposed to live: the country party discovered a similitude between the courtiers and the popish banditti in Ireland, who were usually distinguished by the appellation of Tories; and such was the origin of these foolish and ridiculous terms, which have ever since prevailed in England; and even at present seem not nearer their end than when they were first adopted. Hume.

chose the aldermen Bethel and Cornish, two presbyterians, for their sheriffs. There was a great contest on the occasion; but the country party carried their point, to the no small mortification of the court.

All this time the duke of Monmouth, who had been forbid appearing in the king's presence, upon his having returned to England without his majesty's permission, was labouring hard to get a party among the people: but the boldest stroke, and what alarmed the king and the whole court the most, was, his going publicly to the King's Bench bar at Westminster, with his friends Shaftesbury, Russel, Cavendish, and ten or a dozen more noblemen and persons of distinction, to present the duke of York (his uncle) as a popish recusant. The truth of this allegation was but too notorious: the whole kingdom was sensible of it; but till this time no person had the boldness to take such a step, which was regarded as a settled design to break all measures with the duke.

On the twenty-first of October the new parliament assembled; and it soon appeared that the majority of the house was strongly prepossessed against the measures of the court. The king opened the session with an eloquent and specious harangue. As he knew that both houses had greatly at heart the protection of the protestant religion, he enlarged a great deal upon that head, and used all his endeavours to persuade them, that he was zealously affected to the religion of the church of England, the preservation of which he would ever make one of his principal cares. He recommended to them, in the warmest terms, to lay aside those party animosities and dissensions, which had hitherto troubled their councils: he declared himself ready to join with them in the most perfect harmony and union for restoring domestic peace, by which alone the honour and interest of the nation could be effectually supported; with much more of the like tendency. But the house knew Charles too well to lay any greater stress upon those professions than they merited; nor could all his rhetoric mollify the disgust they had conceived at his conduct, and that of the persons most in favour about him. Instead of appearing charmed with, and thankful for, these gracious declarations of the sovereign, they openly censured the court for the notorious misapplication of the generous supplies that had been granted to it by the parliament: they exposed that profusion, that prodigality of disposition, which rendered the king for ever a beggar, while his people were continually giving with unbounded liberality: they went upon the popish plot: they expelled one of their members for having declared in public conversation, that he believed it all a forgery: they voted sir George Jefferys, one of the king's serjeants, and sir Francis Withens, high-steward of Westminster, betrayers of their country, for being Abhorrers, that is, for having joined in counter-addresses against the petitions for the sitting of the parliament. They next recommended Dr. Tonge, one of the discoverers of the popish plot, to the king, for the next ecclesiastical preferment that should become vacant; and in all probability Charles would have been obliged to gratify them in this point, had not Tonge died soon after. They also gave great encouragement to Dangerfield, and indeed to every other person that had been in any manner instrumental in discovering the popish conspiracy.

The master-blow, however, remained yet unstruck; but on the twenty-sixth of October, within less than a week after the meeting of the parliament, the lord Russel, in direct terms, moved for excluding the duke of York from the succession. He was seconded by sir Henry Capel, brother to the earl of Essex, and several others joined in the said motion. Whereupon the house of commons came to the following resolution on the twenty-second of November, viz. "That the duke of York's being a papist, and the hopes of his coming to the crown had given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present designs and conspiracies against the king and the protestant religion; and that, in defence of the king's person, government, and the protestant religion, they would stand by his majesty with their lives and fortunes; and that, if his majesty should come to any violent death, they would revenge it to the utmost on the papists." In consequence of which vote, a bill was brought in on the fourth of November, "to disable James, duke of York and Albany, from inheriting the imperial crown of this realm;" which occasioned several warm debates. The most concise abstract of these would fill up many pages; and as they are to be found at large in the printed Debates of the House of Commons, and in almost all other historians, I shall omit them, and content myself with observing, that the bill having made its way thro' the lower house, was, on the fifteenth of November, sent up to the lords, where, though it was carried for a second reading by two voices, it was then thrown out by a majority of sixty-three against thirty, all the bishops present voting against it, and the king being also there during the whole time of the debate. The noblemen who chiefly distinguished themselves in opposing the Exclusion Bill in the house of peers, were the earls of Essex, Sunderland, and Halifax, who went by the name of the Triumvirate. It was not long, however, before they gave manifest proofs of a change of sentiments.

The country party could not conceal their rage at the loss of their favourite bill: the commons addressed the king to remove lord Halifax, and the other lords who had voted against it, from his majesty's presence and councils for ever: they issued writs for apprehending several gentlemen of rank and fortune, who had been principally concerned, as foremen of grand juries, in the abhorring addresses: they impeached the lord chief-justice North of high crimes and misdemeanors, for having assisted in the same; and the other lord chief-justice, Scroggs, of high-treason, for having browbeaten the evidences of the popish plot. On the thirtieth of November, the lord viscount Stafford, one of the five popish lords in the Tower, was brought to his trial for being concerned in the said plot; and being found guilty by his peers, he was condemned, and on the twenty-ninth of December beheaded on Tower-Hill, continuing to assert his innocence to his last moment. In a word, it is hard to say which is most deserving the censure of candid posterity, the unwarrantable arbitrary proceedings of the king in many former instances, or the present mad and undiscerning resentment of the parliament. Not content with shewing these marks of their extreme displeasure against the court, they passed the following votes: "That it is the opinion of this house, that there is no security or safety for the protestant religion, the king's life, and government of this nation, without passing a bill for disabling James duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of this realm, &c. and to rely upon any other means and remedies, is not only insufficient, but dangerous."

The king looking upon these proceedings as direct attacks upon his dignity and prerogative, and being apprehensive that if he winked at them, they would soon be attended with more serious consequences, resolved to put a speedy end to their session. This coming to the knowledge of the commons, they met early in the morning of the tenth of January, 1681, the day on which the king was expected at the house to prorogue it; and came to a resolution, "That whoever advised his majesty to prorogue the parliament to any other purpose than in order to passing a bill for the exclusion of the duke of York, is a betrayer of the king, the protestant religion, and the kingdom; a promoter of the French interest, and a pensioner of France." They had some time before refused to grant the king any supply; and now, lest he should be able by other means to support the government, and render himself independent, they passed another vote, importing, That whoever should advance any money upon those branches of the king's revenue arising from customs, excise, or hearth-money, should be deemed an enemy to parliaments, and be answerable for the same in that assembly.

These votes were scarce passed, when the usher of the black rod came to require their attendance in the house of peers; when the king, after having given his consent to several laws of real importance and utility to the nation, prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of January, and soon afterwards dissolved it; at the same time he issued writs for calling another on the twenty-first of March, which was to meet at Oxford.

The king, in making choice of this city for holding his parliament, had in view to deprive the country party of the advantage their close connection with the city of London had given them, and at the same time to punish that capital for the countenance and support it had all along given to the violent councils of the parliament: but here Charles found himself deceived, and that he had taken his measures wrong. The members of the new parliament in the country interest were, almost to a man, the same as had been returned in the preceding parliament; and they brought with them the same resentment, the same avowed spirit of opposition to all the king's measures, and seemed determined to be revenged for the indignity they thought had been put upon them, by his majesty's having so suddenly, and with so high an hand, dissolved their former session.

The assembling of this parliament had indeed rather the appearance of those in the distracted times of the second, third, and sixth Henry, at Clarendon, Oxford, and Coventry, than the peaceful and amicable meeting of a sovereign and his people: each side came armed, and attended by their friends and adherents, as if confident of an immediate rupture. The city members (of London) in particular appeared in the midst of a numerous body of horsemen, distinguished by knots of ribbands, inscribed, NO POPERY, NO SLAVERY. In short, both parties endeavoured to make a display of their strength.

On this occasion Charles shewed a vigor and firmness truly becoming a great prince, and such as appeared the more surprising in him, who had hitherto been remarkable for his facility and irresolution. On opening the session he made a noble, and not inelegant speech; in which, after complaining of the disrespectful proceedings of the last parliament, which were such, he said, as few princes besides himself would have borne with equal patience; he gave them to understand, that as it was not his desire or intention to exercise arbitrary power on them, so he would not allow it to be exercised over himself: and again inculcated to them the necessity of moderation in their debates, as that alone could answer the ends of the nation, who had deputed them as representatives. He was willing, he said, to give them every possible satisfaction in his power, in relation to their fears from a popish successor, by joining with them to establish any practicable scheme for putting the government entirely into protestant hands, during the reign of such an one. In fine, that as on his part he had and would perform every thing that could reasonably be expected from him, so he looked that they should lay aside their animosities, and concur with him in that salutary end, nor, by a revival of their past irregularities, inspire him with a disgust to parliaments.

The commons seemed equally indifferent to the menaces or soothing of the king: they elected the same speaker who filled the chair in the last parliament, and they instantly adopted the same measures; the impeachment of Danby, the enquiry into the popish plot, and the Bill of exclusion. So bent were they upon carrying this last point, that they rejected every expedient offered by the court. In a word, the leaders of the opposition were resolved to be dissatisfied with every thing they could propose, in hopes of humbling them into a perfect compliance with their will. What other motive, for instance, can with any shadow of reason be ascribed, for their rejecting the following expedient, offered by Ernely, one of the king's ministers, to remove all their fears of a popish successor, and which was read in the house on the twenty-sixth of March.

He proposed, "That the duke of York should be banished five hundred miles from the British dominions: that the government should be wholly vested in a regent: that this regent should be the princess of Orange; and in case of her death, without issue or with issue (being a minor) her sister the princess Anne: that if the duke should have a son educated in the protestant religion, then the said princesses respectively to succeed in the regency, during the minority of such son, and no longer: that notwithstanding these kingdoms, out of respect to the royal family, and for the sake of preserving the right of succession, might be governed by the name of James II. yet no man should take arms from him, or by virtue of his commission, on pain of being capitally punished: that all officers, civil or military, shall take an oath to observe this settlement of the government: that acts of the like nature should pass in the parliament of Scotland and Ireland: that the duke of York should should come into any of the three kingdoms, he shall be ipso facto excluded, and the sovereignty devolve to the regent: that all papists of any consideration should be banished by name, and their children be educated in the protestant religion."

These expedients, however rigorous, as indeed they came very little short of an exclusion, if Mr. Echard, from whom this account is taken, has given us a true one, did not appear to the commons (or they would not think them) a sufficient barrier against popery, though the duke of York and his party were so sensible of the force of them, that they declared themselves more against the limitations than against the exclusion itself; and therefore they resumed their favourite bill, and were proceeding to several violent resolutions, when an event happened which created a quarrel between the two houses, and ended in the breaking up of the session.

One Fitz-Harris, an Irish papist, had been employed by the dutchess of Portsmouth, the king's favourite mistress, and another Pompadour, in respect to intermeddling with state affairs, in procuring intelligence of any libel wrote by the country party, or of any designs formed against her, or against the court. This man contracted an acquaintance with one Everard, a spy of the Exclusionists, to whom he proposed to write a libel against the king and the duke of York, apparently with a view to have by this means such a testimony in his hands, as might effectually ruin the Whigs in the opinion of the people. Everard was himself upon the catch, and came into Fitz-Harris's proposals, only with an intent to reveal the whole affair to his patrons. They met by appointment; Everard had planted sir William Waller, a justice of peace, where he might discover the whole of what passed. The heads of a seditious pamphlet were drawn up between the two spies. Fitz-Harris took the paper away in his pocket, was presently pursued by the proper officer attending for that purpose, and was taken with the writing about him. The commons impeached him in the house of lords; but the latter rejected the impeachment, and ordered him to be prosecuted at common law, which occasioned a difference between the two houses: and the commons, with their usual spirit, declared, that whatever inferior court should presume to try Fitz-Harris, or any one that lay under an impeachment, should be deemed guilty of an high breach of privilege. In fine, the dispute grew warmer and warmer. Charles beheld the quarrel between the two houses as the most favourable pretext he could have wished, for cutting short a parliament which was determined to thwart him in all his measures; and by this stroke to spare his beloved brother from the mortification of farther insults, and perhaps keep his right of succession from being violated. Having fixed his resolution, he carefully concealed it, even from his greatest intimates; and going with the utmost privacy to the house on the twenty-eighth of March, 1681, the day the Exclusion Bill was to have a second reading, he dissolved the parliament before they had the least intimation of his design: after which he took coach, and drove directly for London, where he published a declaration, containing his reasons for dissolving the two last parliaments; in which he taxed the commons with a design to wrest the regal authority out of his hands, and subvert the constitution.

This unprecedented act of vigor and resolution in the king was a thunder-stroke to the country party: they were confounded and abashed at being thus circumvented; and knowing not what measure to have recourse to, they retired quietly every man to his habitation. Thus far Charles acted with a becoming spirit; thus far he shewed himself worthy of swaying the sceptre of so great a kingdom: we wish that the subsequent part of his conduct was equally free from reprehension.

But Charles was a man, and, as such, subject to the frailties of human nature: he did not enjoy his triumph with moderation, nor did he duly distinguish between the irregular attempts of a discontented faction to ingross all power to itself, and the noble efforts of a patriotic spirit to withstand the encroachments of the crown on the undoubted liberties of the subject. His parliament had contradicted him; they had wounded him in the tenderest part; and therefore he determined for the future to govern without them; and the rest of his reign was spent in continual attempts to render himself absolute, in which he succeeded but too far, when he grew as cruel and despotic as he before appeared mild and merciful.

What contributed chiefly to the establishment of his arbitrary power, was the fierce animosity which then prevailed between the two parties of Whigs and Tories, which the court carefully fomented. Charles applied himself particularly to the latter: he had frequent conferences with their leaders; to whom he was constantly representing, that the late disputes, and the dissolution of two successive parliaments, in consequence thereof, had been entirely owing to the intrigues of the Whigs, who, under the appearance of an extraordinary zeal for the church and the protestant religion, concealed the most inveterate hatred to monarchy; and that their real design was to bring about its subversion, and establish a republican form of government upon its ruins; by the means of which, they hoped to get the first posts in the kingdom into their own hands, and enrich themselves with the spoils of a civil war, which might be the unavoidable result of their carrying their point: that episcopacy, and the liturgy of the church of England, were alike disagreeable to them: in fine, that they were most of them in their hearts either rigid presbyterians, or rebellious independents.

This artifice had the desired effect; the episcopal party, and all the high-churchmen, took the alarm, and joined themselves to the court, in order to oppose the designs of the Whigs: the clergy every where preached up passive obedience and non-resistance, in the most slavish and absolute sense; and multitudes of flattering addresses flowed in from all parts of the kingdom, advancing the prerogative of the crown to the most extravagant height. The cry was now changed; the church indeed was still represented to be in danger, but it was not from the papists now, but from the Whigs and the presbyterians. In fine, the catholics uniting with the Tories and the common interest, they carried all they desired, and the country party was obliged to bow beneath the power of their adversaries. The duke of York was soon after recalled from Scotland, and resumed his place at the council-board. Charles, who had an affection for, and confidence in him, that exceeded the bounds of reason and sound policy, followed implicitly all the measures he proposed, and in a manner committed the reins of government into his hands, that he himself might enjoy his pleasures uncontrouled.

The effects of this preposterous conduct were soon felt by all who had rendered themselves obnoxious to the court. Fitz Harris was, a little time after the dissolution of the parliament, tried at the King's Bench bar, condemned, and executed; as was also one Oliver Plunket, the popish titular primate of Ireland, for a conspiracy with the French court, in order to stir up an insurrection in that island. The most remarkable sacrifice to the resentment of the court, was Stephen College, a joiner, of London, a man of some abilities, who had shewn himself particularly zealous against popery, and from thence had acquired the name of the Protestant Joiner. He attended the city members to Oxford, where, it is said, he took some indecent liberties, both in speaking and writing verses, reflecting on the king and court. For this, a bill of indictment of high treason was preferred against him to the grand jury, but was by them thrown out: the court, however, was not to be thus baffled of its revenge; he was hurried down to Oxford, and methods taken which were not the most justifiable, to have the bill found there, upon which he was tried, condemned, and executed. On the same day that College suffered (August 31) Titus Oates was, by an order of council, turned out of his lodgings at Whitehall, with a prohibition to appear within the precincts of the court. Titus had done the business he was set upon; and indeed it should seem he was thought to have overdone it: the popish plot was now made a matter of ridicule by the king and his courtiers; the presbyterians were now become the only traitors.

The ruin of Shaftesbury yet remained to complete the triumph of the court party. The duke, to whom he had in a particular manner rendered himself obnoxious, was fully bent to be revenged on him. He was sent to the Tower for high treason, and his trial was to come on at the Old Bailey in November; but he luckily escaped, by the grand jury's not finding the bill of indictment against him: on which occasion there were bonfires and illuminations throughout the city, and even a medal was struck to commemorate the event. Various are the opinions of writers concerning the truth of the crimes alleged against the earl, which were nothing less than a design to seize the king at Oxford, to have brought him to London, and compelled him to have yielded to the demands of the parliament. It was sworn that troops were actually raised in London and other places, besides those who went down with the members, and only waited for the earl of Shaftesbury's orders to march; but I refer to the State Trials for a further account of these proceedings.

The duke of York, who all this time governed Scotland as high-commissioner, carried every thing there according to the desire of the court. He is accused of having acted in a most arbitrary, and even cruel manner, during his residence in that kingdom. The Scottish parliament was entirely at his devotion. They passed an act, acknowledging "That the crown of Scotland had, by an inherent right, by the nature of the monarchy, and the fundamental laws of the kingdom, always descended to the heir of blood, and that no law or consideration could alter the succession." They enacted another statute for imposing upon persons in office a test oath, acknowledging the king's supremacy, renouncing the covenant, and espousing the doctrine of passive obedience." A clause however was admitted in favour of the protestant religion, ratifying an old confession of faith, in which the maxim of resistance was inculcated: A strange inconsistency! and which sufficiently proved the whole to be the work of people of different parties, agreeing only in a servile submission to the will of their ruler. The earl of Argyle, a nobleman of unimpeached integrity, of the presbyterian persuasion, who had adhered to the king in all his adversity, refused to take this motley oath without an explanation; for which he was condemned to lose his head, which he prevented, for the time, by escaping out of the castle of Edinburgh, and retiring into Holland. If we may believe Mr. Hume, and some other writers, who appear to be rather overheated with zeal, the duke of York, during his residence in Scotland, gave proofs of a savage cruelty that out-does any thing we read of to have been practised by the Spaniards upon the defenceless inhabitants of the new world. For the honour of humanity, we hope these reports are exaggerated: certain it is, that the Scottish fanatics omitted no opportunity of incensing the government, by the most indecent and bitter invectives: they were actuated by two furious preachers, called Cameron and Cargill; the first of whom was slain in the act of open rebellion: the other fell by the hands of the executioner, though, after a summary trial, about fifteen other persons suffered death, rather than say, God bless the King, the hardest concession imposed upon them. At length, the duke finding that their infatuation was such, as to bid defiance to all severity, and that they gloried in their sufferings, stopped the hand of the executioner, and the delinquents were only condemned to hard labour for a time proportioned to the nature and degree of their offence. About the close of the year the duke returned to the English court, where he continued his presence and influence to the end of this reign. In the mean time, the king ordered the protestant dissenters to be prosecuted with all the rigor of the law, on the statute enacted against non-conformists in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Before I close the transactions of this year, I think it necessary to inform the reader of a circumstance which I omitted in its proper place; namely, that the commons in the last parliament assembled at Oxford, ordered their votes to be printed every day, that the public might be acquainted with the subject of their deliberations; which practice has been continued ever since.

The mutual animosity of the two parties in the kingdom was now inflamed into rage and rancour; and Charles, who ought as a king to have conducted himself as the common parent of all his people, openly headed a faction. The city of London had hitherto preserved its independence; and the Whig interest predominated there: but the court found means in the following year 1682, to get the lord-mayor and sheriffs chosen from among the king's party: this was a great point gained by the Tories; and Shaftesbury was so sen-

fible of it, and how little favour he had to expect from a London jury under such influence, that he thought fit to quit the kingdom, and take refuge in Holland, in that very country of whose ruin he had been the original promoter, and which he had urged in parliament with all that eloquence which he knew so well how to adapt to his own interest and the circumstances of the times.

The duke of York, finding the city thus gained over, thought it a favourable opportunity to wreak his vengeance on some of its members who had, perhaps, too indecently reflected upon his character; the principal of these were, Pilkington, an alderman, whom he sued in a writ of scandalum magnatum, and was cast in damages to the amount of one hundred thousand pounds, in direct violation of that excellent clause in Magna Charta, which says, "No one shall be amerced to his utter ruin." Sir Patience Ward, who had served the office of lord-mayor, and gave evidence in behalf of the alderman, was sued for perjury, and condemned to the pillory; which ignominious sentence he underwent in that very city, and in the view of these very people over whom he had so lately ruled as supreme magistrate.

The year 1682 furnishes us with few memorable events, except the triumph of the court and the Tories, the ruin of the Whig party, and the persecution of the presbyterians. Some things remain which perhaps the reader may not be displeased to find noticed. In the beginning of the year Thomas Thynne, Esq; was assassinated in his coach in the open street, at the instigation of count Coningsmark, on a quarrel about a lady; for which three persons, one of them the count's footman, was executed.

Two extraordinary embassies arrived in England this year, one from the emperor of Fez and Morocco, and the other from the king of Bantam, in the East-Indies.

On the twenty-ninth of November, this year, died prince Rupert, in the sixty-third year of his age. He was duke of Cumberland, and earl of Holderness, in England; so created by his uncle king Charles I. in 1643. This prince was the third son of Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, daughter of king James I. and brother to the princess Sophia; on whose issue the crown of Great-Britain was settled by act of parliament, the last year of king William III. He made a distinguished figure both by sea and land, in this and the former reign; and died covered with military glory.

About the same time died John Maitland, duke of Lauderdale, earl of Guildford, in England, who had the administration of the affairs of Scotland in his hands great part of this reign; in which office he created himself innumerable enemies: his death was little regretted in either kingdom. Heneage Finch, lord chancellor, an eloquent speaker, and an upright counsellor, who had been created earl of Nottingham, also left the world this year: nor must we forget to mention that the earl of Shaftesbury died in Holland, within three months of his arrival there, in the sixty-second year of his age.

There were several removals at court, and creations of nobility, the latter end of this year; the privy-seal was taken from the earl of Anglesea, and given to George Saville, earl of Halifax, who was thereupon created marquis of Halifax; the earl of Sunderland was again called to the council-board, and on the resignation of lord Conway made secretary of state again: among other creations we must not pass unnoticed that of colonel John Churchill (afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough), who was made baron Churchill of Aymouth; the duke of Grafton, one of the king's natural sons, was made vice-admiral of England, vacant by the death of prince Rupert.

The fore-part of the year 1683 was distinguished by a memorable exertion of despotic power, on the part of the crown; I mean the divesting the city of London of its charter. The last year there had been a very great riot raised by the Whig party, in which they had carried matters to such an unwarrantable length, as to arrest Sir William Pritchard, the lord-mayor, sheriff North, and several other aldermen of the court party, in an action at the suit of Papillon and Dubois, under pretence of the damages these latter had received by not being returned sheriffs. The lord-mayor and his brethren were kept in custody till midnight, and then released: the common-council, however, apprehensive that the court would resent this outrage on the supreme magistrate of the capital, and the rest of their friends, publicly disclaimed the action, by an order of common-council, declaring therein their disavowal and disapprobation of the same; and turned out one Broom, who had been particularly active in the riot, from his place of coroner, declaring him incapacitated to enjoy any place or preferment in the city for the future.

Soon after the election of sheriffs coming on, the Whigs again raised a furious riot, in which they assaulted the lord-mayor, forced him upon his knees, threw off his hat, beat down the sword that was carried before him, and continued the hall, in spite of his adjournment. For this and the former proceedings, it was determined to bring a Quo warranto against the city, to shew they had forfeited their charter by these tumultuous doings: in the mean time, on the eighth of May this year, the attorney-general, by order, laid an information against fourteen persons concerned in the latter riot; these were the then sheriffs Pilkington and Shute, now lord Grey of Werk, Sir Tho. Player, Cornish Bethel, and others of inferior note, who were tried, convicted, and condemned in heavy fines. The city, in order to reconcile themselves to the court, did about this time set up the statue of king Charles I. in one of the niches of the Royal Exchange, and made several submissions, but all in vain; for the court, glad of this opportunity to humble the capital, was resolved not to let it slip.

Accordingly, on the twelfth of June, a writ of Quo warranto was brought by the king against the city, in the King's Bench of Westminster, that is, an enquiry how it became a corporation, and "by what warrant" it enjoyed its privileges. On such occasions, the corporation against which the Quo warranto is issued, produces the charter of its privileges; and the question is, Whether it has exactly obeyed the conditions and articles of its charter?

On this occasion, exclusive of the late treasonable insurrections, as the court party affected to call the late riots, it was pretended that the city had forfeited all its privileges, and ought no longer to enjoy the rights of a corporation, by reason of two offences, which the court of aldermen and common-council had committed.

After the great fire in 1666, all the markets had been rebuilt, and had been furnished with many conveniences; and in order to defray the expences of these reparations, the magistrates had imposed a small toll on all those who brought any goods to market. This was supposed to be an usurpation of powers to which they had no title, and an encroachment on the prerogative of the king, and the privileges of the parliament, who alone had a right to impose taxes.

In the year 1679, the city had addressed the king against the prorogation of parliament, and had made use of the following expression: "Your petitioners are greatly surprized at the late prorogation, whereby the prosecution of the public justice of the kingdom, and the making of necessary provisions for the preservation of your majesty, and your Protestant subjects, have received interruption." These words were construed into a scandalous reflection on the king and his measures*.

The attorney and solicitor generals conducted the suit in behalf of the crown; the defence of the city was managed by Treby and Pollexfen, then esteemed the two most eminent men in their profession; the pleadings were drawn out to a very great length; for which I must again refer the reader to the State Trials: the result of the matter was, that the court gave judgment against the city, whose liberties and franchises were declared to be forfeited, and sentence given that they should be seized into the king's hands. Severe reflections were then, and still are, made on this judgment, greatly to the dishonour of the king and the court. However that may be, the citizens were struck with the greatest consternation; and the common-council assembled to consult what was to be done in this exigency. It was proposed, by an entire submission to the will of the court, to deprecate its wrath; and thus prevent the recording the Quo warranto, and the total extinction of the liberties of the city: this proposal was warmly combated by the Whig party; they represented the late action of the court as a most notorious violation of their rights and charters; to which, added they, we shall in some measure be accessory, if by a dastardly submission we acknowledge their assumed authority. Fear, conjoined with interest, however, prevailed over that firmness and resolution which might have been expected from the capital of the English nation. An humble deputation was sent to his majesty, requesting the restoration of their charter: the king granted their petition, but not till they had made such concessions as, in effect, annihilated even the shadow of liberty amongst them†.

The city of London thus humbled, all the other corporations in the kingdom thought it would be in vain to struggle with the court; and most of them tamely resigned their charters into the hands of the king; nor could they obtain the restoration of them till they had paid considerable sums; and even then all the places of power and profit were, like those of the capital, left entirely at the disposal of the crown. This was truly the triumph of despotism. The English were no longer that bold and resolute people who had made their monarchs tremble on the throne, in defence of their ancient privileges; they were dwindled into dastardly slaves, who courted the yoke of oppression, and servilely licked the feet that trampled on their freedom.

We are now come to the discovery of the Protestant Plot, as it was called, though it is difficult to conceive the propriety of that term in a protestant country. It is commonly known by the name of the Rye-house Plot, from a house so called, in the road to New-market, possessed by Richard Rumbald, one of the conspirators, where it is pretended a design was formed to assassinate the king and his brother. It is almost impossible for an historian who relates the events of these times, not to displease some part of his readers, and incur the censure of partiality, if he goes about to determine the truth or futility of the facts advanced by either party. I shall therefore confine myself to the simple narrative of those circumstances that were acknowledged by both parties.

The first person who discovered this conspiracy was Josias Keeling, salter and citizen of London, who made and subscribed his confession on the twelfth day of June this year, before the earl of Dartmouth and Mr. secretary Jenkins; but reflecting that the deposition of a single witness would not be sufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, under-sheriff of London, and one of the conspirators, to admit his brother John Keeling to the next meeting of those concerned in the plot. This was done; and then Josias Keeling taking his brother John with him to the secretary, they both gave their joint testimony upon oath, on the fourteenth of June. Upon the depositions of these two men, a proclamation was issued for apprehending colonel Rumsey, Rumbald master of the Rye-house, Nelthorpe, Wade, Goodenough, Walcot, Thompson, Burton, and Home. Rumsey surrendered himself; and upon his confession, which was confirmed by West and Sheppard, two others of the conspiracy, there was another proclamation issued for apprehending the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, sir Thomas Armstrong, and Robert Ferguson. Shortly after, the lord Howard of Effrick came in; and upon his information warrants for high-treason were issued out against the earl of Essex, the lord Ruffel, and others, who were accordingly apprehended.

The plot is said to have consisted in the following particulars: To attack the king's guards, and seize the persons of the king and his brother; and if that attempt should miscarry, to assassinate the king and the duke in a hollow way near the Rye-

* Rapin. Smollett. Hume.

† They were as follow: "That no mayor, or other officer of the commonalty, should exercise his office, until his election should be confirmed under the king's sign manual: that in case his majesty should disapprove of their choice of a mayor and sheriffs, they should proceed to a new election; and provided the second election should be disagreeable to the king, they should appoint persons of his own nomination: that the mayor and court of aldermen should be impowered to divest any alderman of his office by the king's permission: that should any alderman, after his election, be deemed incapable by the court of aldermen, the ward should be obliged to chuse another; and should he prove unacceptable to the court, a third should be elected by the court itself; and that the justices of the peace in London should act only by the king's commission."

house, in their return from Newmarket. This done, the conspirators were to have repaired in all haste to London, to join their brethren in the city, assemble their forces, and break out into open rebellion*. The prisoners were not kept long in confinement: Walcot was first brought to his trial on the twelfth of July. The evidences against him were Rumsey, West, and one Bourne a brewer, who all concurred in deposing that the prisoner had been at several meetings held the preceding year, on the business of the plot: that he was to have been an active person therein, being pitched upon to head those who were to attack the king's guard. Walcot in his defence alleged, and offered to prove by undoubted testimony, that he was ill of the gout all the time the king was at Newmarket. The evidence against him was, however, greatly confirmed, by a letter wrote by the prisoner himself, while under confinement, to secretary Jenkins; wherein he promised to reveal all that he knew in either of the three kingdoms, relating to a plot against his majesty, if he might be secured of the royal pardon. In conclusion, he was found guilty of high-treason by the jury. Home and Route were likewise tried and condemned, and in a few days all three were executed at Tyburn.

The next person who was brought to his trial was the lord Russel, son to the earl of Bedford. The witnesses produced against him were Rumsey, Sheppard, and the lord Howard of Escrick, a man who had been his intimate friend. Tho' the evidence against this nobleman was, by every impartial person, held as slight and imperfect, yet he too was brought in guilty. His case was by most people thought very hard; for he was condemned only for words spoken by others in his presence. Lord Howard was the chief evidence, and he was obliged to save his own life. By his conduct in this affair, he rendered himself so odious to every one, that not a man of character or reputation of either party would be afterwards seen in his company. The lord Russel was a nobleman universally beloved, and many eminent persons appeared for him, as, the duke of Somerset, the earl of Anglesea, the lords Cavendish and Clifford, Dr. Tillotson, and Dr. Burnet; but all to no purpose.

But what was supposed chiefly to have prejudiced the jury against lord Russel was, an accident that happened during the trial: the earl of Essex that very morning was found dead in the Tower, with his throat cut in a shocking manner. The news of this was immediately carried to the Old Bailey, and served to impress the minds of the judges, the council, and the jury, with a belief of the reality of the plot, since the earl of Essex, rather than stand his trial, had chosen to lay violent hands on himself. The king's council and the lord chief-justice made a suitable use of this incident in their charge to the jury; though it was afterwards industriously given out that the earl was murdered by other hands than his own, and even by order of the king and the duke, who had been in the Tower that very morning, where they had not been for many years before. This, however, to use the words of a modern historian †, "is a circumstance which might naturally be interpreted in their favour; for had they really been concerned in such an atrocious crime, they would have hardly appeared upon the scene; a step which could not fail to raise the suspicion of the public:" besides, not to mention the attestation of Dr. Burnet, who had it from the earl's family, that he was not only subject to great fits of the spleen, but was a professed advocate for suicide, it is our duty to take notice, that the countess of Essex, who had caused all imaginable enquiries to be made after the cause of this fatal end of her lord, did publicly declare herself satisfied that he had met with no foul play; and concurred in the verdict of the coroner, who declared the deceased felo de se. But to return:

After the condemnation of the lord Russel, a petition was presented to the king by his lady, daughter of the good earl of Southampton, for a pardon, which it seems probable would have been granted, had not the prisoner insisted to the last, that resistance was lawful; a doctrine which the court, or rather the duke of York, who conducted all its determinations, held incompatible with the duty and loyalty of a subject. Moreover, the duke could never forgive Russel for the zeal he had shewed in behalf of the Exclusion Bill: in fine, all intreaties to save him were ineffectual, and on the twenty-first of July, 1683, he was beheaded in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, whither he was attended by Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Burnet. He died with the greatest composure and resignation, denying with his last breath his having been privy to any design against the king's person, or to alter the government: he professed his entire belief in the popish plot, and his firm attachment to the protestant religion.

For a conclusion to this tragedy, I must mention the trial, condemnation, and execution of colonel Algernon Sydney, brother to the earl of Leicester, who was accused of being concerned in this plot to kill the king. This gentleman had been deeply engaged in support of the republican schemes and form of government during the late troubles: he had even been nominated one of the late king's judges, but declined taking his seat on that infamous occasion. He was, however, a sworn foe to monarchy, on the restoration of which he withdrew into Holland; but desirous of revisiting his native country, he took the benefit of the act of indemnity, and in 1677 returned to England. He soon engaged in the country party, became a warm stickler for the Exclusion Bill; and, in a word, opposed with all his interest and eloquence, every design and measure of the court. Such a conduct could not fail to render him highly obnoxious to those in power, and it was resolved to stretch the law to the utmost in order to effect his ruin. In the month of November he was brought to his trial: the only witness who deposed against him was lord Howard. In the course of his trial, he proved by the testimonies of the earls of Anglesea and Clare, Mr. Philip and Mr. Edward Howard, Dr. Burnet, and others, that the lord Howard had

* This conspiracy, it seems, was first formed a little after Midsummer the preceding session 1682, and every thing was in readiness for the intended assassination, in the beginning of the spring of the year, when the king and duke were, as usual, to go to the races at Newmarket; but a fire happening in that confessed, "That he could not get his pardon till he had done some other jobbs, and had gone thro' all the drudgery of swearing:" but no notice was taken of this; nay, although the law expressly requires two witnesses, the king's council had recourse to a strange expedient to supply this defect, and which, to the disgrace of a court of judicature, was admitted as competent by Jefferies, lately made lord chief-justice of the King's Bench, who afterwards rendered himself so infamous in the succeeding reign. His house having been searched, among his papers was found a manuscript on the Original and Forms of Government, which appeared to be an answer to a book written by sir Robert Filmer, to prove that, by the laws of God and nature, kings, and particularly those of England, were invested with absolute and unlimited power. Sidney in his manuscript Answer had asserted a doctrine the reverse of this, and in terms that were equally extravagant; but this Answer had never been published, nor even printed, and intended only for his private use or amusement: nevertheless, the council insisted that this book was equivalent to a second witness, inasmuch as it was a proof of his principles and intentions. Finch declared it an overt act, observing, scribere est agere, that writing is acting. Jefferies delivered it as law, and said all the judges were of the same mind*. In short, the jury brought him in guilty, and he suffered on the scaffold the seventh of December, the king having changed his sentence of hanging to decapitation.

I shall not trouble my reader with the trials of the other accomplices in this plot, real or pretended, as they furnish nothing worthy his notice, after what has been already delivered. I shall only observe, that some of them were most heavily fined, and others committed into the hands of the executioner. Sir Thomas Armstrong, who was thought to have been the principal instrument in seducing the duke of Monmouth from his duty, was executed without trial, and his limbs dispersed thro' the principal towns of the kingdom. Titus Oates was about this time accused of speaking some disrespectful words of the duke, and condemned in a fine of one hundred thousand pounds, and committed to prison till he could pay it. A like fine was imposed upon one Dutton Colt, for a like offence; and sir Samuel Barnardiston, who had incurred the displeasure of the court, by having been foreman of that jury which rejected the bill against the earl of Shaftesbury, was amerced in ten thousand pounds, because in some private letters which had been intercepted, he had taken the liberty of censuring the public measures. I mention these trials, though they have no connection with the Rye-house Plot, in order to shew the temper of both judges and juries at this period, and the little security men had for the enjoyment of their lives or fortunes.

The duke of Monmouth, who had absconded on the first discovery of the plot, now wrote two letters to the king, full of the most humble and submissive expressions. Monmouth was the beloved son of Charles, who felt all his tenderness revive, accepted of the guilty youth's submissions, and allowed him to come to court; nay, the king indulged him so far, as to promise he should not be obliged to give public evidence against any one: he was, however, required to sign a letter owning the plot in general, and tacitly justifying the evidence against those who had suffered. This letter, which was actually signed by the duke, the reader will find in the note †. Monmouth in a few days repented of the step he had taken, and with great earnestness entreated the king to return him the paper. Charles was so highly incensed at this behaviour, that he banished Monmouth the court, who went over to Holland, where the king, notwithstanding all that had passed, corresponded with him by letters, unknown to the duke of York, and privately made him remittances of money.

Whilst the trials for the Rye-house Plot were depending, the university of Oxford presented their famous Decree to his majesty; a servile piece of court flattery, more suitable to an absolute monarchy than a limited one, such as is that of England; and the Oxonians, in the overflowings of their loyalty, seemed to have held for nought the natural rights and liberties of mankind.

The discovery of the late plot had wrought greatly upon the people in favour of Charles; they still had an affection for his person, and could not without horror reflect on any attempts levied at his life. The severities lately practised were universally attributed to the duke of York, and that prince became daily more disagreeable to the nation: his enemies omitted no opportunity to blacken his character, and we shall find that the hatred he had brought upon himself by his unpopular conduct, was the principal cause of his being ignominiously driven from the throne of his ancestors, to which he had otherwise an indisputable right. His brother Charles, desirous to increase his own popularity by every possible expedient, and knowing the fear of popery to be the predominant passion in the minds of his people, thought proper to bestow his niece Anne, daughter to the duke of York, on prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, a protestant. The nuptials were celebrated on the twenty-eighth of July this year, about the height of the assassination plot: but though he gratified his subjects in this instance, no consideration could induce him to summon a parliament, or trust the nation with the election of new representatives, who might, in their collective capacity, become formidable to his newly-assumed despotic power. In this resolution he was strongly upheld by his brother York, who at the same time put him upon such measures, and rendered it indeed unsafe to convene such an assembly.

Tangier, on the coast of Barbary, part of queen Catherine's portion, was by the king's order de-

† "I have heard of some reports of me, as if I should have lessened the credit of the late plot, and endeavoured to weaken the evidence given against those who have died by the hands of justice. Your majesty and the duke know, how ingenuously I have owned the late conspiracy; and though I was not conscious of any design against your majesty's life, I yet lament my having had so great a share in the other parts of that conspiracy. I have therefore, sir, taken the liberty to put this into writing for my own vindication: I beseech you to look forward, and endeavour to forget the faults you have forgiven me. I will take care, on my part, never to commit any more against you, or incur the danger of being misled from my duty; but make it the study of my life to deserve the pardon which your majesty hath granted to your dutiful

molished this year, as in his present disposition not to call a parliament, he could not support the expence of keeping it.

As the city of London had not formally acknowledged their acquiescence in the decree issued against them, the king ordered the judgment on the Quo warranto to be recorded; then he seized the government of the city into his own hands, and sent a commission to sir William Pritchard, continuing him in the office of lord-mayor during his pleasure. He likewise confirmed the two sheriffs under the same restriction, but dismissed the recorder, and put another in his place.

Little happened abroad this year worthy our attention, unless the memorable siege of Vienna, the capital of the empire; before which Cara Mustapha, the Turkish grand vizier, at the head of one hundred and thirty thousand men, sat down about the middle of July; and having reduced the place to the last extremity, was, on the twelfth of September, obliged to abandon his enterprize, by John Sobieski king of Poland, and the duke of Lorraine, general of the Imperialists. On this occasion the Turks received the greatest defeat from the Christians that is mentioned in history, it being computed that no less than seventy thousand of the Infidels were killed at the siege and in the battle. Several English volunteers signalized themselves in the defence of Vienna, and among them the lord Lansdown, son to the earl of Bath; in consideration of whose merit the emperor created him a count of the Roman empire.

In the beginning of the year 1684, the earl of Danby, who had remained several years a prisoner in the Tower, and had often, but in vain, moved to be admitted to bail, was brought to the King's Bench bar, and indulged with that privilege, on entering into a recognizance himself in ten thousand pounds, and two of his friends five thousand pounds each, for his appearance in the house of lords the next session of parliament. The four popish lords remaining in the Tower were also admitted to bail on the same day (February 12): the lord Petre had died in that place about a month before. On his death-bed he had sent a letter to the king, wherein he declared, by his hopes of salvation, that he was innocent of the plot with which he was charged.

The greatest part of this year was taken up with prosecutions against disaffected persons, as they were called; that is, every one who offered to speak or write against the worse than Turkish despotism now exercised by the court. Among others was Mr. Samuel Johnson, who had been the lord Russell's chaplain, and was now fined in five hundred marks for writing a book, entitled, Julian the Apostate; in which he exposed and confuted the prevailing notions of passive obedience and non-resistance. A great many other persons were tried for speaking ill of the king, the duke, and the government, who were fined in large sums, and some of them pilloried. Sir George Jefferies, chief-justice of the King's Bench, signalized himself in a particular manner on these occasions: equally devoid of honour, humanity, and conscience, he raised himself to that high post by the most servile complaisance to the will of the duke of York and his party. During his holding assizes in the north, he so terrified the people by his arbitrary and unjust sentences, that all the towns corporate, by way of conciliating the favour of the court, delivered up their charters, and threw themselves entirely upon the mercy of the government. The king having thus obtained possession of these invaluable pledges of the people's liberties, thought proper to publish a declaration, thanking his subjects in the most affectionate terms for having reposed such confidence in him their sovereign, assuring them he would use it with moderation, and convince the most extravagant republicans, that as the crown was the origin of the people's rights, so it was the surest support of their liberties*.

In order however to engage the affections of a prince invested with such power, the Hamburg company thought proper to erect a marble statue to him this year, in the midst of the Royal Exchange, where it still remains, with an inscription on the pedestal flattering him as if he had been the greatest and best of all kings; but alas! how vain! how empty are those titles which servile adulation bestows contrary to the general sentiments of a nation, and how little capable of imposing upon impartial posterity!

In the midst of all these triumphs of ill-acquired power, Charles secretly languished beneath the conscious guilt of being the oppressor of a free and generous people: he had been put upon measures, he had yielded to counsels that his own heart told him were not consistent with his own honour, or the welfare of his people: by nature formed of a gentle disposition, he had suffered arbitrary, and even cruel proceedings to receive the stamp of his royal authority: he saw, but he saw too late, that while he compelled his subjects to submit to his desires through fear, he had lost the firmest hold a monarch can have over the millions subjected to his dominion, the mastery over their hearts; and, if we may believe those most conversant about the court at that time, he began to form a design of altering his conduct, of throwing himself upon his people, and renewing the true constitutional intercourse between a British king and a British parliament.

In the mean time, however, his mistaken maxims of domestic government had likewise influenced his conduct in regard to foreign affairs; and while he was intent on rendering himself absolute at home, he had suffered the French monarch almost to enslave the rest of Europe. Lewis, notwithstanding the peace of Nimeguen, continued to give laws to half the princes on the continent: he seized into his hands the antient and free town of Strasburg: on the pretence of a slight affront, he bombarded Genoa: the empire he insulted in its head and principal members. These arbitrary proceedings at length roused the court of Spain, and she declared war against this general oppressor, weak as she was, relying on the powers of Europe, who, according to the dictates of common reason and good policy, should have flown to her assistance. The prince of Orange indeed, to his honour be it spoken, exerted his utmost endeavours to defeat the designs of Lewis; but Charles discovered not the least jealousy of the growing power of France; he rather seemed inclined to aid her ambitious monarch in his schemes of universal empire. Europe saw and trembled at this supineness in a prince, who by his situation had in his hands the balance of her liberties; tho' at length the repeated representations of the several ambassadors of the respective courts concerned, opened the eyes of the long-deluded Charles: he beheld with amazement the destructive path he had so long been led in; he resolved to retrace his steps, and by one bold act shake off the inglorious dependence in which he had hitherto been held: the headstrong, imperious temper of the duke, who was continually engaging him in dangerous attempts, now began to fill Charles with fear and apprehension. He was one day overheard to say, "Brother, I am too old to go again to my travels; you may if you please."

In short, he began to grow melancholy and reserved; he opened himself not with the usual freedom to his brother; and he is said to have formed a design, by the instigation of the duchess of Portsmouth, who saw that the present mode of government could not long subsist, to regain the good will and affection of his subjects, by convoking a free parliament, discarding all his unpopular ministers, recalling Monmouth, and sending the duke of York into Scotland: but the execution of these laudable designs, if really formed, were anticipated by the death of Charles, who was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, on Monday the second of February, 1684, and his recovery looked upon as desperate: and though upon bleeding he recovered his senses again, yet it was only for a short time; for four days after, February sixth, he expired in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh of his reign, if we reckon from the death of his father king Charles I. but in the twenty-fifth only computing from his own restoration. His death was attended with such circumstances as gave strong suspicion of his having been poisoned, and the papists bore the odium of having perpetrated so execrable a deed, in order to prevent the reformation the king proposed making in the government, which must end in their ruin; whereas they had every thing to hope for under the reign of his successor, a blind bigot to their faith. There is, however, no certain proof of this, and the duke is acknowledged by all parties to have had no hand in it.

Dr. Burnet, in the History of his own Times, gives us the following account of the manner in which the king passed his last moments: "He was constantly attended by bishop Ken, who was more in his favour than any other prelate. This good man took all opportunities to fit and prepare the king for his approaching dissolution; and when the duchess of Portsmouth, the favourite mistress, came into the room, prevailed on his majesty to command her absence, and to send for the queen and ask her pardon for the violation of her bed, which was readily complied with; and the bishop apprehending his majesty to be sincerely penitent, proposed his receiving the blessed sacrament. The duke of York being apprised of this, and finding the king not likely to live many hours, was desirous that the Roman catholics might have the honour of his dying in their communion: he therefore sent for and introduced to his majesty, then hardly sensible, Father Huddleston, a Benedictine monk, who had a great hand in saving the king's life after the fight of Worcester: then all who were in the bed-chamber were ordered to withdraw, except the earls of Bath and Feverham, and the door was double locked; then Huddleston caused the king to go through some acts of contrition; and after such a confession as he could then make, he administered to him the three popish sacraments of Penance, Extreme Unction, and the Eucharist, the duke all the while assisting with great fervency of devotion. The company was then re-admitted, and bishop Ken pressed the king six or seven times to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the church of England; but his majesty declared he was very weak. Soon after he died."

What we have said of this prince in the beginning of his reign, and the relation of his conduct during the time he held the sceptre, so strongly mark his character, that there is hardly any necessity to retouch the portrait. Former historians have indeed exhausted themselves on this subject; and as they have been influenced by their connections with, or attachment to, different factions, have described Charles as the most odious, or the most amiable of princes. Some scruple not to compare him to the Roman emperor Tiberius for cruelty and deceit: others, while they allow him the common frailties incident to humanity, paint his good qualities in the most lively and agreeable colours. Mr. Hume, in his history of the Stuarts, seems to have summed up Charles's character in a more impartial and concise manner than any writer who has gone before him: I shall therefore give it the reader nearly in that author's own words:

"In the duties of private life, his conduct, though not altogether free from faults, was, in the main, commendable. A generous lover, an obliging husband, a friendly brother, an indulgent father, a good-natured master: had he been born in an inferior station, he would probably have passed through the world with the affection of some, and without incurring the hatred of any: but, placed as he was in a high sphere, for which he was altogether unqualified, he drew upon himself, by his indolent temper, the contempt not only of the neighbouring potentates, but even of his own subjects. Negligent of the interests of the nation, regardless of its glory, averse to its religion, jealous of its liberty, lavish of its treasures, sparing only of its blood, he exposed it, by his rash and pernicious measures, to the danger of a furious civil war, and even to the disgrace of a foreign conquest."

Charles II. was in his person tall and swarthy, and his countenance marked with strong harsh lineaments: his penetration was keen, his judgment clear, his understanding extensive, his conversation lively and entertaining; "his wit, to use the expression of the marquis of Halifax, could not be said so much to be very refined or elevated, qualities apt to beget jealousy and envy in company, as to be a plain, gaining, well bred, recommending kind of wit; and tho' perhaps he talked more than the strict rules of politeness might permit, men were so pleased with the easy and affable deportment of the monarch, that they always went away contented, both with him and with themselves."

It would be doing injustice to this king, did we omit to mention, that few princes ever passed more acts of parliament for the benefit of the subject. Trade and manufacture flourished more in this reign reign than at any other æra of the English monarchy. The arts and sciences were cultivated with good success, though not greatly encouraged by the sovereign, who, tho' he had himself made some proficiency in mechanics and chemistry, and was no bad judge of genius; yet was so beset by mistresses and craving courtiers, that he had neither money nor attention for literary merit. In the first year of this reign, a few philosophers, who had established conferences for the mutual communication of their discoveries in physics and geometry, procured a patent; and having enlarged their number, were denominated the Royal Society. This institution began to soften the manners by improving the understandings of men: the principal members who first composed this society, were lord Brouncker, sir Robert Murray, Dr. Wilkins bishop of Chester, Mr. Robert Boyle, who had made a great progress in natural philosophy, and Dr. Ward, afterwards bishop of Exeter, a professed mathematician.

To this period the learned world was indebted for the illustrious Newton, who investigated the first principles of the general system of the universe, which till then had remained hidden. All that the enquiries of past ages had effected in natural philosophy, was nothing in comparison with the single discovery of the nature of light. In a word, the works of this great man will reflect eternal honour on the nation that gave him birth. Stillingfleet, Tillotson, Tennison, Patrick, and Lloyd, were shining lights in divinity: the practice of medicine was greatly improved by the judicious Sydenham: the belles-lettres were making daily advances towards perfection: Dryden held the chief rank in poetry, though his writings are justly censurable, as well for their incorrectness, as for the vein of licentiousness which runs through the greatest part of them; the depravity of the public taste, and the pressing necessities of the writer, may however be pleaded in excuse for these faults. His Ode on St. Cecilia's day stands unrivalled in the English language. Wycherley, as a comic writer, and Otway in his tragedies, had both great merit: the latter, however, received so little encouragement, that he died almost destitute of the common necessities of life. The love of literature in this age inspired the breasts even of the highest personages: the court itself became emulous of the bays. The duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal still shines distinguished in the rank of comic satire: the earl of Rochester, vicious as his sentiments were, possessed such a strange power of pleasing, that while we condemn his morals, we cannot but be enchanted with the music of his numbers. The earls of Dorset, Roscommon, and Mulgrave, wrote with ease and spirit, and with that pleasing negligence which is so peculiar to the gentleman writer. The marquis of Halifax is deservedly distinguished for his refined genius; and had he not been a principal personage in the state, he would have claimed the first rank in literature: but business spoiled the writer. Of all the authors of this age, sir William Temple is the most entertaining and instructive *. In fine, to close the character of this reign, we may say, that the genius of the nation acquired immortal reputation under Charles II. though the administration did not.

The nuptial bed of this prince was not blessed with any issue; but he left a numerous progeny the fruits of his illicit love.

By Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, esq. James duke of Monmouth; born in 1646, married to Anne Scot, daughter and heiress of Francis earl of Buccleugh in Scotland, and executed on Tower-hill, 1685.

By Mrs. Elizabeth Killegrew, viscountess Shannon, daughter of sir William Killegrew, Charlotte-Jemima-Henrietta-Maria Fitzroy, married first to James Howard, and afterwards to the earl of Yarmouth.

By Mrs. Catherine Peg, daughter of Thomas Peg, esq. Charles Fitz-Charles, earl of Plymouth, commonly called Don Carlos, born in 1658, married to lady Bridget Osborne, daughter of the duke of Leeds, and killed at Tangiers in 1680.

By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, heiress of William viscount Grandison in Ireland, and wife of Roger earl of Castlemain, created lady Nonsuch, countess of Southampton, and duchess of Cleveland, three sons, and as many daughters, viz. Charles Fitzroy, created duke of Southampton, and after his mother's death, duke of Cleveland; Henry Fitzroy, duke of Grafton; and George Fitzroy, duke of Northumberland; Anne Fitzroy, married to the earl of Suffex; Charlotte Fitzroy, married to the earl of Litchfield; and Barbara, who became a nun at Pontoise in France.

By Louise de Querouaille, duchess of Portsmouth, Charles Lennox, duke of Richmond.

By Mrs. Eleanor Gwynn (commonly called Nell Gwynn) an actress, Charles Beauclerk, duke of St. Albans: And,

By Mrs. Mary Davis, a lady of the same profession, Mary Tudor, married to the earl of Derwentwater.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES.

The most remarkable things which happened in this reign, besides the terrible fire of London in 1666, already mentioned, were,

The plague in the year 1665, of which seventy thousand died in London, besides thirty thousand that died of other distempers. This is the last plague that ever we had in England.

Several comets appeared in this reign; the most remarkable whereof was seen at Falmouth on the twenty-second of November, and for seven days successively, two hours every morning before sunrise, and about as long after sun-set, having a fiery tail, extended to a very great length, and was seen the next month in several other parts of England and Ireland.

In the year 1683 was one of the longest and hardest frosts that till then had happened in England. It began about the middle of December, and continued till the fifth of February: a fair was kept on the Thames, and oxen roasted on the ice: the coaches drove from the Temple to Westminster-hall on the river as frequently as in the streets.

* We must not pass over unnoticed the witty doggrelist Butler, who by his poem of Hudibras contributed more than any other person to expose the fanaticism and false pretences of the old republicans. The advantage which the royal cause received from this work was prodigious; yet the king allowed the author, who was a man of probity and virtue, to live in obscurity; and die in want.

JAMES II. the fourth King of ENGLAND of the Name of STUART.
A. D. 1685.

NOTWITHSTANDING the vigorous attempts made by the two last parliaments of the preceding reign to exclude this prince from the succession, on account of his religion, his brother Charles had no sooner paid the debt of nature than he was proclaimed king, without the least appearance of opposition on the part of his subjects; not but that they had apprehensions, and those of the most alarming kind: but James, who could not but judge this to be the case, took a very prudent step at his first accession, to quiet the minds, and gain the confidence and affection of his people; and indeed, had he made good his professions, the nation would have had no cause of uneasiness. Immediately upon the decease of his brother, he assembled the privy-council, when, after lamenting the loss himself and the public had sustained by this melancholy event, he declared to them in a speech, that he was determined to do his utmost to preserve the government both in church and state, as it was then established by law; and that however he had been represented as a man of arbitrary principles, it was his firm resolution to support his subjects in the uninterrupted enjoyment of all their religious and civil privileges; and that as he would never invade any man's property, so he would never depart from the just rights and prerogatives of his crown. He likewise intimated an intention of preserving the balance of power in Europe, and freeing the nation from that state of dependence, or rather vassalage, in which it had hitherto been held by its ambitious neighbours. James had distinguished himself, while in France, in a military capacity; and the commendation given his valour by the prince of Condé and marshal Turenne, those two great masters of the art of war, had established his character as a soldier: the English had seen repeated proofs of his abilities and courage as a sea commander, and few persons in Europe were thought to excel him in the knowledge of maritime affairs: the people therefore entertained the most pleasing hopes from this declaration of their new sovereign; and his friends the Tories were not wanting in setting forth the extreme probity and good faith of James, who, they said, never was known to falsify his word as a private man, and much less could be suspected so to do now that he was invested with the sacred dignity of king. The populace easily believed all they heard, because it was all they wished. His speech was printed, and read with great applause. Addresses were poured in from all quarters, filled with the warmest expressions of loyalty and affection. James himself was the dupe of his own artifice: he thought the voice of a part of his subjects the sentiments of the whole kingdom.

But the thinking part of the nation, and those who were the best acquainted with the character of the king, were not to be imposed on by his specious assurances: indeed it was a kind of infatuation to suppose that he really entertained the sentiments he professed. They had known him, while duke of York, to be a bigot to popery, and a zealous opposer of the protestant religion: they had been witnesses to the frequent instances he gave of a merciless and cruel disposition, and of a total disregard to the liberties of the people, and the established form of government: they knew him to have been the principal adviser and promoter of all the unpopular and arbitrary measures which his brother pursued in the latter part of his reign, and that he himself was the sworn friend of Lewis XIV. whose ambition all Europe dreaded, and, like that monarch, a professed enemy to all heretics; and was it likely that he should cherish such sentiments less when he came to be king? James was sensible, penetrating, and enterprising; but then he was headstrong, violent, and arbitrary, and his judgment was not clear. How could it be expected that a king with this strange mixture of good and bad qualities, could ever render his people happy?

James did not long keep his subjects in suspense concerning his real sentiments and intentions. The first Sunday after his accession he went publicly to mass: this, however, was looked upon as nothing strange, considering how many years he had openly professed the popish religion: but the people were more alarmed when, some time after, he issued a proclamation for continuing the customs and duties granted to the late king. This was a direct violation of the constitution, by which no imposts can be levied upon the subject but by act of parliament, and a plain indication what regard he had to the liberties of the nation: but whatever body the most wondered at, and which indeed is an action there is no possibility of accounting for, but from his blind zeal for his religion, is his exposing, without any necessity, the insincerity of his brother in his repeated assurances of his attachment to the protestant religion, by ordering Huddleston to publish an account of Charles's dying in the Roman catholic faith, and his producing two papers which had been found in that king's closet, written in his own hand, in defence of popery.

James, however, in disposing of public employments, and settling the officers of his household, did not yet think fit to shew much partiality to those of his own communion. All those who possessed posts under the late king were continued in their respective offices by proclamation*: this was a politic step in the new monarch.

* The duke of Ormond was continued lord-steward of the household; the earl of Arlington, lord-chamberlain; the lord viscount Newport, treasurer; the lord Maynard, comptroller; and Henry Saville, esq. vice-chamberlain of the household. Soon after, Lawrence Hyde, president of the council, and the king's brother-in-law, was constituted lord high-treasurer of England;

the earl of Clarendon, his other brother-in-law, was made lord privy-seal; the marquis of Halifax, lord-president of the privy-council; the duke of Beaufort, lord-president of Wales; the lord Godolphin, chancellor to the queen; and Henry Bulkeley, esq. was made master of the king's household.

JAMES II.

The late king having been interred privately, and at a very little expence (a poor return for the tenderness he had shewn to his brother all his lifetime) James and his queen were crowned by archbishop Sancroft on St. George's day (April 23) 1685. The king would not receive the sacrament, but all the rest of the ceremony was performed according to the form of the church of England. His priests, doubtless, dispensed with his compliance in this respect, as well as with the coronation oath.

King James now thought fit to shew his resentment against the witnesses for the popish plot. The famous Titus Oates was, on the eighth and ninth days of May, tried before the lord chief-justice Jefferies on two indictments for perjury: the one for swearing that he himself, and several other jesuits, were at a treasonable consultation in London, on the twenty-fourth of April, 1678; whereas it was clearly proved by a multitude of witnesses, both protestants and papists, that he was at that time at St. Omer's in Flanders. He was therefore found guilty; as he likewise was of the second indictment, for swearing that William Ireland the jesuit, executed in the late reign, was in London on a certain day, when he was, upon the fullest evidence, proved to have been one hundred miles distant from London. Whereupon Oates was sentenced to pay one thousand marks upon each indictment, to be stripped of his canonical habit, to stand twice in the pillory, and five times a year afterwards as long as he lived; to be imprisoned for life, and to be whipped, first from Aldgate to Newgate, and the next day but one from Newgate to Tyburn, which was executed with great severity, so that he swooned away several times; and it was astonishing that he escaped with his life.

Dangerfield, another of the plot discoverers, was tried soon after, for having formerly written a seditious libel, reflecting on the late king and the government; of which being convicted, he was sentenced to stand twice in the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn another, and to pay a fine of five hundred pounds. As he was returning in a coach from his second whipping, he was insulted by one Francis, a barrister of Gray's-Inn; to whom the other making a warm reply, and spitting in his face, Francis in a rage pushed his cane in his face, which unfortunately running into his eye, Dangerfield died in great torment a few hours afterwards. Francis was immediately apprehended; and the court very prudently, as well as justly, rejected all application for his pardon, and he was deservedly hanged.

The same day Dangerfield was tried (May 30) Richard Baxter, the famous presbyterian preacher, who had bore a great share in spiriting up the people against the government in the reign of Charles I. was brought to his trial in the King's-Bench for a work of his, intitled, A Paraphrase on the New Testament; in which were several passages grossly reflecting upon episcopal government in general, and on the bishops of the church of England in particular. He was fined five hundred marks, and obliged to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years.

As to the proceedings on these trials, the credit of the evidence produced, and the validity of the defence made by the prisoners, I would advise my reader to have recourse to the State Trials, and not to trust to the partial representations on either side. I shall only observe, that it appears somewhat extraordinary that the chief-justice Jefferies should have behaved with so great passion and partiality as he is on all hands allowed to have done on these occasions. In regard to Oates's affair in particular, it is very certain that Jefferies had been one of the most strenuous of the late king's council, in supporting that man's evidence in the popish plot, against the very witnesses on whose deposition he was now condemned. It may naturally be supposed that king James was not displeased with an opportunity of punishing those who had endeavoured to bring such a load of infamy on the religion he professed, and even on his own character: but then, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that Oates was a man of a most infamous character, and had undoubtedly been the instrument of taking away some innocent lives, by unpardonable prevarications, or rather falsifications, in regard to times and places.

The parliament of Scotland met on the day of the coronation, being assembled by the duke of Queensberry, who represented the king's person as lord high-commissioner. His grace made known to them his majesty's gracious declaration in council, and assured them that they were equally included therein with their brethren of England: at the same time he caused a letter to be read from James to the Scottish parliament; in which he inveighed against the fanatics, or rigid presbyterians, whom he called horrid murderers and assassins, and desired the states would take proper measures to secure the kingdom against their intrigues. The parliament on this occasion shewed the most abject submission to the royal will in every act of its session: a fawning and humble address was sent to the king on his accession: they confirmed the act of the preceding reign for maintaining the established religion: they annexed the excise to the crown: they enacted a statute, making it high-treason to give, take, or defend the national, or, as it was called, the solemn league and covenant; and another against house and field conventicles, ordering, that such who should hereafter preach at such conventicles, or be present at field conventicles, should be punished with death: and in a vote which they called an offer of duty, they professed their abhorrence of all principles and positions that any wise tended to derogate "from the king's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute authority and power."

In England the parliament, the only one in this reign, met on May 19. The court had employed every art to influence the elections, and had succeeded so far, that the new house of commons consisted almost entirely of Tories: the king therefore had no reason to fear an opposition to any measures he might think proper to pursue, provided he kept within the bounds of common prudence. His speech on meeting them, however, was rather in the stile of a prince who knew how to make himself feared, than one who wished to unite himself to his people by the most secure of all ties, those of mutual affection and confidence. He did indeed renew in the most solemn manner, the promises he had made before the privy-council; but at the same time he told them, that he expected they should settle his revenue, and that during his life, as in the time of his brother; and con-concluded with these remarkable words: "Some men," said he, "may object, that, by feeding me from time to time with such supplies as they deem sufficient, they will better secure frequent meetings of parliament: but as this is the first time I speak to you from the throne, I must plainly tell you, that such a method would be very improper to employ with me, and the best way to engage me to meet you often, is always to use me well."

The drift of this speech was clearly comprehended, and it occasioned many learned debates on both sides the question; but the court party prevailing, the house granted him all that he desired, which enabled him afterwards to govern without a parliament. As a farther instance of their regard for the king, the house of peers, upon the petition of the lords who had been bailed out of the Tower, thought fit to discharge their bail, and to dismiss them. A bill also passed that house for revoking the attainder of the lord viscount Stafford; but it was dropped in the lower house, after it had received a second reading. We must not omit to mention, that the two houses joined in an address of thanks to the king for his speech, and promised to stand by him with their lives and fortunes. This obliging disposition in the English parliament, and the servile compliance of that of Scotland, gave James the highest satisfaction, who flattered himself with the hopes of a peaceful and happy reign.

The calm, however, did not last long: the earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland in the late reign, on being accused of having been concerned with the duke of Monmouth in a scheme for raising a rebellion in that kingdom, thought the time was now come when he might successfully stir up his countrymen against James, whom he looked upon as the author of his disgrace and misfortunes. He imparted his design to Monmouth, who was, like himself, an exile in Holland; and this giddy young man gave readily into the project. They hired a few ships of the Dutch, and got together about two or three hundred of the English exiles in Flanders, men of desperate fortunes, and who had no view of retrieving their affairs but by a change of government at home: this was all the resource the duke and earl had to depend upon, except their hopes of being joined by a considerable number of the Whig party, in case they could effect a successful landing in England or Scotland.

Having concerted their measures, the two chiefs of the malcontents separated, in order to follow each his plan of operations. The earl of Argyle, with a small company, but arms for five thousand men, sailed from Holland the beginning of May, and made a descent upon Scotland. He soon found himself deceived in his notion of being joined by a considerable number of his friends; they came not in as he expected: he made a shift indeed to get together about two thousand men, chiefly of his own clan, in the Highlands: but the government having received advice of his intended enterprize, were prepared for his reception. A considerable body of troops were sent against him soon after his landing; upon which he, by the help of his shipping, transported his men from place to place, till two or three of the king's ships of war arrived in those parts, and then he was compelled to quit the sea-coasts, and march into the country, where he was hotly pursued by the royal army; and after flying for some time before them, his followers abandoned him, and he himself running into a water up to the neck to escape his pursuers, was taken by a countryman, who ran in after him and knocked him down. Being thus seized, he was sent under a strong guard to Edinburgh, where his head was cut off, and set upon the Tolbooth. Rumbold, the old master of the Rye-house, who had fled for that plot, and some others who had now come over again with the earl, were also taken and executed: the earl's father had suffered the like fate on the same occasion. It is surprizing that his tragical end had not proved a warning to his son, not to engage in such perilous enterprizes, where the successful are at best but deemed fortunate traitors.

Monmouth was no less unsuccessful in his attempt: that nobleman sailed out of the Texel on the twenty-fourth of May; and after having been detained nineteen days at sea by contrary winds, landed at Lyme in Dorsetshire, on the eleventh of June, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much greater number. Some of his officers dispersed themselves about the country, in order to engage the gentry and the common people to take up arms and join them; in which they so far succeeded, that the duke's little party was increased to two thousand men, mostly from the adjacent counties. On his first landing he had published a kind of manifesto or declaration, in which he set forth the cause of his coming over, which he said was for the recovery of his natural right (asserting the validity of the late king's marriage with his mother) and to free the nation from the tyranny of the duke of York, whom he accused as the author of the dreadful conflagration that had reduced the greatest part of the capital to ashes; of the late popish plot for taking away the life of the king, and for the subversion of the protestant religion; of the murder of the earl of Essex in the Tower; and of having poisoned the king his brother. Lastly, he represented that his very religion incapacitated him from swaying the sceptre of this kingdom, which must never hope for ease or safety while a papist and a tyrant sat on the throne.

This declaration, which upon the whole was fuller of invective than sound reasoning, produced very little effect in the duke's favour: few persons of any distinction joined his standard; his army consisted chiefly of a rude undisciplined rabble: in short, the whole affair was as ill conducted as it had been rashly undertaken. About a week after his landing at Lyme, he marched to Taunton, where he took upon him the title of king, and was proclaimed in that town, on the twentieth, by the name of James II. By this time his army, such as it was, amounted to about five thousand men: but the duke, instead of marching directly to Bristol, the taking of which would have given great credit to his cause, and been of effectual service, by furnishing his army with refreshments, wasted his time in the ridiculous pageantry of his proclamation at Taunton; and this gave the king time to assemble an army, which was now in full march against him, under the command of the duke of Albemarle.

Monmouth began now to be sensible of the temerity of his project: he saw that nothing was left for him but to fight and conquer; he therefore resolved to to prevent the king's forces in their design to surprize him, and set forward to meet them, in hopes of taking them unprepared for an attack; but herein, as in all the rest, he was disappointed. When he came in sight of the royalists, he found them drawn up in excellent order, at Sedgely-moor, near Bridgewater. Early the next morning (July 6) the fight began; Monmouth's horse fled at the first charge, which was thought to be owing to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of the lord Grey, who commanded them; and who being taken, readily obtained the king's pardon. The foot was not so easily routed: they maintained their ground with great resolution for some time; but being deserted by the horse, and exposed to a most dreadful fire from the artillery of the king's army, they at length gave way, when a most dreadful slaughter ensued amongst them; three hundred were killed on the spot, one thousand in the pursuit, and as many made prisoners.

The unfortunate duke of Monmouth, after having endeavoured in vain to retrieve the fortune of the day by the most noble efforts of personal courage, and seeing all lost, took to flight. He now saw his assumed sovereignty vanished in air, and all his mighty prospects appeared like a dream that passes away, and is no longer remembered. He fled as far as his horse would carry him, being attended only by a German servant, who had come over with him from Holland, when his beast dropped under him with fatigue. He was obliged to pursue his forlorn way a-foot till he came to a poor cottage, where having changed cloaths with the peasant who occupied it, he continued his flight, till, unable longer to walk, he laid himself down in a ditch thick-covered with fern. Unfortunately, however, a party of the king's forces passing by the cottage the next day, knew the duke's cloaths upon the countryman's back, who being seized, told them which road the duke had taken; and after strict search, he was the next morning found in his hiding-place, with his pocket full of green pease; the only food he could find to keep off the attacks of hunger. He was immediately conducted to London, and lodged in the Tower.

Monmouth, brave as he was in arms, was not proof against this cruel reverse of fortune. On his arrival in London, he wrote to the king in the most abject terms, humbly imploring his pardon, and protesting by the most solemn asseverations, that if his majesty would graciously please to overlook his former errors, he would endeavour by his future conduct to render himself worthy of so great a favour. All these submissions availed him nought; James was inexorable: the duke sued for an interview; James granted it; but it was only with a view to make his own advantages of it. He thought his wretched prisoner might be induced, through fear of death and hope of pardon, to impeach some of his principal accomplices; but no such infamy dwelt in the heart of Monmouth: culpable and mistaken as he was, he refused to purchase life at the expence of honour. He resigned himself to his fate; and

James, forgetful of the blood from whence he sprung, and regardless of his brother's dying recommendation of this unhappy youth to his favour, ordered him for immediate execution. The duke's conduct in his last moments proved that his abject behaviour, on his first being apprehended, was the mere effect of human nature, oppressed by great calamity. He met his death in a manner that became his rank and character. On the fifteenth of July he was brought to his execution, which was attended with a shocking circumstance: the executioner was seized with such a trepidation just as he was about to execute his office, that he struck the unfortunate duke five strokes with the ax before he could sever the head from the body. Thus died James, duke of Monmouth, whose character in many respects was truly amiable: he was brave, gentle, generous, sincere; but too open to flattery, and too warmly addicted to pleasure, the effects of his education in a court which was the emporium of debauchery. He was the darling of the people; the consciousness of which, and the allurements of ambition, had engaged him in enterprizes for which he was of all men the least qualified, and which in the end cost him his life.

This victory, gained in the very beginning of his reign, seemed to establish the king's power and authority on the firmest basis; but by the cruel use he made of it, and the despair into which his subjects were driven, it proved one of the principal causes of his ruin. Jefferies, the lord chief-justice, was, soon after the execution of Monmouth, sent into the West, to try the unhappy persons who had been any ways concerned in the late rash and ill-concerted rebellion. Colonel Kirk, a soldier of fortune, who had long served at Tangiers, and, from his intercourse with the Moors, had contracted an inhumanity totally unknown in European countries, attended him with a body of troops, to keep the people in awe. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by these two inhuman fiends in the shape of men, must fill every reader with horror. They hanged up numbers in the most insulting manner, many without form of trial. Kirk caused thirty to be executed at once in sight of himself and officers at dinner. Observing them to quiver in the agonies of death, he said that he would give them music to their dancing, and immediately ordered the drums to beat, and the trumpets to sound. Ten of these unhappy wretches were turned off with a health to the king, ten with a health to the queen, and the other ten with a health to Jefferies. The lady Lisle, widow of one of the regicides, but herself a loyalist, and now deeply stricken in years, was beheaded for harbouring a presbyterian minister of Monmouth's party, though not one of the persons mentioned in the proclamation. The jury thrice refused to find a verdict against her; they were as often sent back with menaces and reproaches by the brutal Jefferies, and were at last compelled to bring her in guilty. Many other instances are given of the brutish cruelty of this judge and his military assistant *. In short, some hundreds were executed,

* One execution was attended with such circumstances of treachery, as well as barbarity, as to merit a more particular relation. A young maid implored the pardon of her father ||, and threw herself at Kirk's feet, armed with all the charms

|| Some say she was a young married woman, and that it was for the life of her husband that she sued,

and the West became like a shambles, by their quarters being fixed up in the roads and public places. The infernal monster Kirk triumphed in his barbarous ingenuity; he caused the whole country to be ravaged by his soldiers, whom he allowed to live on free quarters; and Kirk's Lambs, as he, by way of pleasantry, affected to have them called, is an appellation remembered with horror to this day in the western counties. Jefferies boasted on this occasion, "That he had hanged more than all the judges since William the Conqueror:" and so acceptable had he made himself to his master by this bloody work, that, at his return, he was created a baron, and rewarded with the office of lord high-chancellor, upon the death of the lord-keeper.

Numberless were the other instances of severity exercised in London, and different parts of the kingdom, upon the protestant party, on pretence either of the Rye-house plot, or of their having favoured Monmouth's design; in which revenge, and the scheme for establishing popery in these kingdoms, appear to have had an equal influence. This had been the favourite plan of James whilst duke of York, but was never openly attempted till now, when, being freed from Monmouth's rebellion, he thought himself in a state of perfect tranquillity. He began in Ireland, where he dissolved the privy-council, and appointed a new one, the majority of them papists: the protestants of that kingdom were every where disarmed, whilst means were found of keeping on foot a standing army of catholics. Colonel Richard Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, by cashiering such officers and soldiers as he thought proper, and putting others in their stead, soon modelled it to the purposes it was intended for.

The situation of James was at this time as prosperous as any sovereign could desire. He saw a standing army at his beck; he had a parliament which he knew was ready to prevent him in all his desires: passive obedience and non-resistance were inculcated as articles in the English creed: foreign states seemed to vie with each other in courting the favour of a monarch, who confessedly held the balance of Europe in his hands. These advantages, however, instead of inspiring James with a desire to preserve them by a prudent conduct, which would in no wise have impaired his power, only served to intoxicate him; he thought he had no longer any occasion to disguise his sentiments, or suffer restraint in his actions; and he began to discover his arbitrary principles in a manner not to be mistaken. The parliament meeting on the ninth of November, after a prorogation, he opened the session with a speech; in which, after congratulating them on the happy suppression of the late rebellion, he took notice, that the great head the rebels had got to before they were quelled, had been entirely owing to the want of a regular force being at hand to oppose them at their first insurrection: the house, he said, must be sensible that the militia was very insufficient for the defence of the kingdom on such exigencies; and therefore plainly told them, that he was determined to support those regular forces which he had raised, and now increased to fifteen thousand men, and demanded a supply for their maintenance: at the same time, he desired that the parliament would not take exceptions that he had admitted some catholic officers into his army, and that he had in their favour dispensed with the law commanding the test to be taken by every one who enjoyed any public office. "They are most of them known to me, added he, and have served me faithfully in the late commotions: and I will deal plainly with you, that, after having the benefit of their service in such a time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them."

This parliament had, ever since its existence, shewed the greatest approbation of the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, and given signal proofs of its attachment to the king's person, particularly in the case of the rebellion, when it granted subsidies exceeding even what he could have asked. It had increased his annual revenue, and made it perpetual: was it probable then that a parliament so generous and complying, would have made any difficulty of setting aside such a trifling law as the Test Act? Thus James thought, but he found himself mistaken. This pliant, this submissive parliament still remembered there was such a thing as liberty entailed on the people of this happy land, and that they were sworn conservators of that inestimable treasure, in behalf of the people. They would have gone any decent lengths rather than come to a rupture with the king, or incur his displeasure; but this open declaration on his part to govern without the laws, or rather to act in open defiance of them, opened their eyes; and some who had been the warmest against the Exclusion Bill, began to be alarmed at the king's large strides towards arbitrary power. In the house of lords, the motion for an address of thanks to the king for his speech met with great opposition; and though it passed by a small majority, the house resolved to take the speech into further consideration: but it was otherwise in the house of commons; for when the lord Middleton, secretary of state, made a motion that they should immediately return his majesty thanks for his speech from the throne, several of the members refused it; and a motion being made for an address to the king against employing popish officers in the army, contrary to the known laws of the land, it was carried in the affirmative, and the address was accordingly presented, at which his majesty was highly offended. In the mean time, the commons granted a supply of seven hundred thousand pounds: nevertheless, the king sent them a sharp reprimand for the liberty they had taken with him in their address, and peremptorily told them, that he was fixed in his resolution, both in regard to keeping up a standing army, and employing catholic officers. The commons, who appear to have been terrified into submission by this haughty message,

The struggle was hard and severe, to lose her father, or to part with her honour. At last the force of filial affection overcame all selfish regards. The maid submitted to the conditions: but after she had passed the night with him, the inhuman ruffian, next morning, shewed her from the window her father, the darling object for whom she had sacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he privately caused to be there erected for his execution. This shocking and unexpected sight struck her with such a sudden surprise, that she was instantly seized with a phrenzy, and never after recovered her senses. Hume.

offered to indemnify the officers already employed, and to pass a new act, qualifying a certain number whom the king should name; yet rather than have his dispensing power contested, he, on the twentieth of November, prorogued the parliament, by which he lost the supply the commons had voted, and which happily had not passed into a law, otherwise the constitution had been exposed to the most imminent danger, as James would then have been enabled to carry his design into execution, without demanding any further supplies from his parliament; for they had gone so far as to vote that three hundred thousand pounds of the sum mentioned should be annually levied for nine years and an half to come.

In Ireland and Scotland the king carried on his designs with greater success than he had as yet been able to do in England. The duke of Ormond was, in the beginning of 1686, removed from his post of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, notwithstanding his many services, and inviolable attachment to the royal family: and colonel Talbot being made earl of Tyrconnel, was put in his place, who soon got the Test Act repealed in that kingdom. In Scotland the earl of Moray, who in complaisance to the king had changed his religion, found means to supplant the duke of Queensberry; and being made high-commissioner, convoked the parliament, to whose care and humanity he recommended, in his majesty's name, his poor catholic subjects, for indulgence in the exercise of their religion. A bill was accordingly brought in for permitting papists the private exercise of their religion; but it was warmly opposed, and deferred to further consideration: then the king ordered the commissioner to prorogue the parliament, and by virtue of his own prerogative established liberty of conscience through the whole kingdom. From this time the catholics got into most of the offices of trust or profit, as well civil as military, in both these kingdoms, to the no small satisfaction of James, who hoped, by means of the influence they would necessarily acquire, to complete the scheme he had formed of introducing popery and arbitrary power throughout his dominions.

By this time the earl of Arlington was dead, and his place of chamberlain was bestowed upon the earl of Mulgrave, who had acquired a great share of the king's favour. Sunderland was appointed secretary of state, and became in effect prime minister.

Encouraged by the success he had met with in Ireland and Scotland, James now set himself to work to carry his point in England likewise: the first step he took for this purpose was to get the judges to declare their opinion in favour of the dispensing power. He sent for them one by one, and had private conferences with them in his closet, whence the odious term of Closeting first took its rise; but he met with a resistance from some of that venerable order, which gave him a good deal of uneasiness. Sir Thomas Jones, lord chief-justice of the Common Pleas; Montagu, lord chief-baron of the Exchequer; sir Robert Charlton, one of the justices of the Common Pleas; and baron

Nevil, openly declared against the dispensing power, as subversive of the laws of the land. For this they were turned out of their places, and others put into them, who were known to be creatures of the court. Amongst those, to the indignation of every protestant, one Mr. Milton, a professed catholic, was made a baron of the Exchequer. The king then proceeded with his council as he had done with his courts of law: he warmly solicited the nobles about his person to oblige him, by changing their religion, and embracing the Roman catholic faith. This very modest and constitutional demand was rejected by many with the contempt it deserved*. The earl of Sunderland was so base as to purchase favour at this price: Rochester the treasurer, though the king's brother-in-law, was deprived of his office, for refusing to give this instance of complaisance: the treasury was put in commission; and lord Bellasis, who had been so long imprisoned for the popish plot, was appointed first lord of that board. Clarendon, keeper of the privy-seal, was likewise displaced for his refusal, and his office bestowed upon lord Arundel of Wardour, another of the five popish lords: at the same time the lord Dover and the earl of Tyrconnel, both outrageous catholics, were sworn into the privy-council.

And now the king having new-modelled his council and his bench of judges, it was necessary in the next place to strike some stroke that might impress the minds of the people with a notion of the legality of the dispensing power in the sovereign. For this purpose, one Godwin, a coachman belonging to sir Edward Hales, a gentleman who, to please the court, had changed his religion, was desired to bring an action against his master, for exercising the office of governor of Dover-castle, not having qualified himself by law by taking the test, &c. This cause was heard with great solemnity before the judges. Sir Edward pleaded the king's dispensing power; when, after abundance of learned arguments on both sides, the judges, as had been preconcerted, gave it as their opinion, "That the dispensing power was a prerogative inseparable from the kings of England." Thus all the fences to the constitution were at once thrown down, and all the rest of James's reign was wholly employed in taking measures to render himself absolute, and establish popery. The papists, emboldened by the countenance of the sovereign, and still more by this decision of the judges, began every-where to set up the public exercise of their religion: the jesuits erected colleges and seminaries in all the principal towns; four popish bishops were publicly consecrated in the king's chapel, and sent into several parts of England to exercise episcopal jurisdiction over those of their own communion. Monks and friars were now to be seen in all public places, habited in the vestments of their respective orders. Lieutenancies of counties were bestowed on declared papists, nor was it long before popish justices of the peace, and other popish magistrates, swarmed all over England. All places of honour and profit were shared among catholics, or persons popishly in-

* The king even condescended to exhort Kirk to become a convert. The barbarian told him, that he would have been extremely willing to gratify his majesty in this particular, but that he was unhappily pre-engaged, having already given his promise to the king of Morocco, that, if ever he changed his religion, he would turn Mussulman. Hume.

clined, to the prejudice of protestants, many of whom were displaced to make room for those new intruders.

James was encouraged in these violent attempts against the constitution by Lewis XIV. his own queen, who was a bigotted Papist, and the Jesuits; which latter never ceased persuading him to persevere in restoring their religion, and with it their credit. Father Peters, his confessor, was admitted into the privy-council: in a word, the king acted with so little discretion, that the cardinals at Rome used to say of him, by way of jest, that he deserved excommunication, as a person who was going about to destroy the small remains of the catholic religion that still existed in England. Pope Innocent XI. conceived such indifferent hopes of James's projects, that he never would grant a cardinal's hat to Peters, though warmly solicited to it by the king. This Peters was a Jesuit, a hot-headed, intriguing man, who, mad with the ambition of becoming a cardinal and primate of England, was the chief person who pushed the misguided king on to the precipice from which he afterwards fell. Taking advantage of his sovereign's blind zeal, he put him upon sending the earl of Castlemain this year on a solemn embassy to the court of Rome, with instructions to make his holiness the most solemn assurances, in the king's name, of his entire devotion to the holy see, and requesting him to send over a legate a latere to reconcile the long schismatic church of England to the apostolic communion; but the pope was a person of too much discernment to be seduced by this dazzling offer: he judged better than James of the little likelihood there was of succeeding suddenly in such a scheme, which demanded the utmost prudence and caution, and could alone be the work of time: he tried all means to evade giving the ambassador an audience, till the earl pressed it in such a manner, that decency would no longer permit the pope to refuse this mark of respect to the representative of so great a prince; but when he at length admitted his excellency to an audience, the good pontiff was seized with such an opportune fit of coughing, as interrupted the earl's speech, and obliged him to retire. The earl made several new attempts to deliver his message; but the pope still happened to labour under the same malady, which so piqued the ambassador, that he threatened to return. The pope, with great coolness, made answer, that, since his excellency was resolved to go, he would advise him, while he travelled, to set out early in the morning, and repose himself during the heat of the day, otherwise the climate of Italy might prove dangerous to his health. Innocent, however, thought proper to return the king's compliment by having a nuncio at London, and he invested with that character Ferdinando Doda, an Italian Jesuit, who had been about the king's person ever since his accession.

The late flagrant breaches of the king's promises to maintain the protestant religion filled the greatest part of the nation with the most melancholy apprehensions. On this occasion, to their immortal honour, the clergy of the church of England exerted their talents to the greatest advantage in defence of their religion against the errors of popery, which those of that communion were every day maintaining in pamphlets and other writings with the most unparalleled audacity. Upon this the court issued an order prohibiting the inferior clergy preaching on controverted points of religion: but this order was little regarded; our divines continued their laudable efforts; Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Tennison, Patrick, Sharp, and some others, shone with distinguished lustre on this occasion.

This honest boldness greatly irritated the king and his popish council, and they resolved to make use of some expedient whereby they might effectually restrain the clergy from thus opposing their designs. After much consultation on this subject, it was determined to erect a commission for ecclesiastical affairs. This court, known by the name of the High Commission Court, had, together with the Star-chamber, another instrument of arbitrary power, been abolished in the reign of Charles I. by act of parliament; to which a clause was added, prohibiting the re-establishment of these courts, or any other of the like nature: but James now held all laws at defiance. The commission was issued, and Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury (who would never act in it) with Crow and Sprat, bishops of Durham and Rochester; the earls of Rochester and Sunderland, chancellor Jefferies, and lord chief-justice Herbert, were appointed commissioners: on Sancroft's peremptory refusal to take up his commission, the bishop of Chester was put into his place. These commissioners were vested with the same inquisitorial powers which had been possessed by the former court of High Commission*; and the ecclesiastical state, with all its dependencies, was subject to the arbitrary determinations of these commissioners.

Shortly after the commission was opened, Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, and dean of Norwich, had preached a sermon, wherein he had inveighed against popery, and expressed his apprehension of the danger that then threatened the established church. This sermon had given great offence at court, and the king himself wrote to Dr. Compton, bishop of London, ordering him to suspend Sharp from his clerical function, till he should have given satisfaction, and his farther pleasure was known therein. On receipt of the order, Compton wrote a letter to the earl of Sunderland, principal secretary of state, which he desired might be communicated to the king, representing, that he the bishop could not, according to law, and as a judge, proceed to condemn a man before he had knowledge of the cause, and had cited the party to answer for himself. The furious James was all in a flame at this insolent dallying with his authority, as he termed it; and the bishop was called before the new court on the ninth of August this year, and by a majority both himself and the doctor were suspended.

* Their commission empowered them, or any three of them, of whom the lord-chancellor was to be one, "to exercise all manner of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to visit, reform, correct, amend, and punish all offences whatever against the ecclesiastical laws, by suspension, deprivation, censures of the church, &c. The commissioners (or any five of them, of whom the lord-chancellor was to be one) were also authorized to visit the universities, cathedral and collegiate churches, colleges, grammar schools, and other ecclesiastical corporations; to examine their statutes, rules, ordinances, letters-patents, and writings, and the same to alter, correct, and amend, at their pleasure." Burnet. Rapin. Salmon.

Not content with thus impetuously following his popish proceedings, he resolved to shew his people what they must expect if they presumed to dispute his will. Though it was now a time of profound peace, he caused a camp to be formed at Hounslow of fifteen thousand men, the standing army he had, in spite of the parliament, kept on foot, and gave the command to the earl of Feverham: in this camp was a public chapel, where mass was said every day. James fondly imagined that this standing military force, officered by Roman catholics devoted to his service, would enable him, like some of his arbitrary neighbours, to carry every point he pleased in this kingdom: but he did not reflect that this army was composed of Englishmen, who would be the first to abandon him, whenever they should be made sensible that he intended to use them for the destruction of their own and their fellow-subjects liberties.

The keeping on foot this standing army, and the abolition of the Test Act, or what came to the same end, the dispensing with the penalties it had decreed against those who should refuse to take it; together with the obstinate refusal of the king to join in the measures which the other powers of Europe were taking to secure themselves against the ambitious designs of France; these proceedings, I say, filled the people with a thousand melancholy apprehensions. Some thought James had, after the example of his brother, entered into a secret treaty with Lewis XIV. and had adopted that monarch's plan of government. In short, it was not doubted that the king would even send for an auxiliary force over from his good neighbour, in case his present forces were not thought sufficient for establishing his arbitrary projects. At this time the dock-yards were incessantly at work in repairing and fitting out ships of war: this proceeding, at a time when the nation was in profound peace, increased its alarms and suspicions. The opposers of the government gave out, that this fleet was intended to act against the Dutch, with whom the court were about to come to a rupture, in order from thence to find a pretext for excluding the prince of Orange for ever from the succession, as, unless such exclusion could take place, whatever had been, or was to be done for the establishment of the Roman catholic religion, would be rendered fruitless. These suspicions, which were not without the appearance of probability, and which the Whigs circulated with great assiduity, completely ruined the king in the affections of his people.

The murmurs against the government became every day more loud. A minister, whose name was Johnston, published a paper, addressed to the officers and soldiers in the camp at Hounslow, representing the guilt, baseness, and infamy, of serving as instruments to destroy the religion and constitution of their country. For this affair having been solemnly degraded, he was set twice in the pillory, was whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, and fined five hundred marks: but this writing being dispersed in the army, made such an impression as was thought to have contributed not a little to the defection that happened in it afterwards.

About the same time Miles Prance the goldsmith, who had been a witness against the persons tried for the murder of St. Edmundsbury Godfrey, was brought to his trial for perjury; and pleading guilty, was fined one hundred pounds, and ordered to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. Some will have it, that, terrified by the severity he had seen exercised on Titus Oates, he pleaded guilty merely to escape his punishment. We shall not pretend to decide on this point: in such cases, every man is at liberty to form his own conjectures.

Neither the ill success of his late negotiation at the court of Rome, the continual complaints of his own subjects, nor even the remonstrances of some of the most sensible and prudent of his popish counsellors, who were fearful their sovereign was running too great lengths, and intreated him to moderate his zeal, could divert James one moment from the pursuit of his darling purpose, the advancement of the catholic faith in these kingdoms. Deaf to all sober advice, he listened only to the suggestions of his own blind superstition. Knowing himself deserted by the church party, he affected to care for the presbyterians. In the beginning of the year 1687, he sent his declaration into Scotland, suspending, by virtue "of his sovereign authority, prerogative-royal, and absolute power," (the express words of the declaration) all oaths, tests, &c. imposed upon non-conformists, professors of the Christian religion. In this declaration, "first, he allows the moderate presbyterians to meet in their private houses only, but forbids all field-conventicles, under the most rigorous penalties. In like manner, he tolerates quakers to meet and exercise in their form, in any place or places appointed for their worship." Then the declaration proceeds to include the catholics, who, after a long encomium on their loyalty and integrity, are declared relieved from all acts of parliament made or executed against those of their faith. In the same paper, however, the king reiterates his former promises of maintaining the protestant religion, as by law established, and its bishops and regular clergy in the full enjoyment of their rights, liberties, privileges, &c. &c.

On the fourth of April the king published the like declaration for liberty of conscience in England, only not quite in so high a stile. It is not to be wondered at, that the several sects of protestant dissenters should at first look upon this declaration as an instance of great indulgence in the crown to tender consciences. Accordingly, addressees of thanks were crowded in to the throne from all denominations of nonconformists, wherein they flattered the king in the most fulsome manner: the anabaptists led the way; the quakers followed: next came the independants; and lastly the presbyterians. It is remarkable that the greatest part of these addressers, speaking of the royal power, exalted it beyond all measure; in particular, the presbyterians; those very people who had first set the example in the reign of Charles I. to the rest of the nation, to prescribe the strictest limits to the exercise of the royal authority. Human nature is always the same: the dissenters thought themselves unkindly used by that monarch: they thought James treated them like a tender parent. It was not long, however, before they discovered that this act of the king's was at best but a snare laid for the whole protestant interest in the kingdom, and they readily joined with the church of England in combating the destructive doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance.

James did not think this step for the interest of the popish religion sufficient, unless he could procure greater advantages for its professors. Hitherto the papists had not been able to procure any preferments in either of the universities, which they passionately desired. This point therefore was the next to be carried; and as the king had already introduced the catholics into the administration of court affairs, he resolved to procure them a share in the government of the church. An order was sent by the king and council to the university of Cambridge to admit Father Francis, a Benedictine monk, to the degree of master of arts, without administering to him the usual oaths. The university had the spirit to refuse its compliance, and petitioned the king to recal his mandate: upon which they were summoned before the ecclesiastical commissioners, to answer for this act of disobedience. The vice-chancellor was suspended; the senate also were reprimanded, and ordered to send up copies of their statutes: but as the university chose Dr. Balderon, master of Emanuel-college, a man of spirit, to succeed in that office, the king thought proper to desist from his purpose.

Having failed in this attempt, he resolved to try his influence with the university of Oxford, never supposing that they, who had been the foremost to establish by their famous decree the doctrine of passive obedience, would make the least hesitation to put their principles in practice, when solicited thereto by a power they had so highly exalted. It happened that the presidentship of Magdalen-college became vacant, and a day was appointed for the election of another president; but before that day came, the king sent down his mandate to the vice-president and fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, a man of a very indifferent character, who had promised to declare himself a catholic, into that office. The college refused to comply, as being contrary to their statutes, and actually made choice of Dr. Hough; for which they were summoned before the ecclesiastical commissioners at Whitehall, who suspended the vice-president, and deprived the new-elected president: but as the university had proved the character of Farmer to be notoriously bad, the king sent them a second mandate to elect Dr. Parker, bishop of Oxford, a tool of the court, and a reputed papist. The fellows, abiding by their choice, would not obey this mandate any more than the former: they cited the statutes and oaths they were obliged to observe, or else deliberately perjure themselves: they shewed that the bishop of Oxford was no better qualified than Mr. Farmer, having never been fellow either of Magdalen or New-college, and therefore not to be elected.

The king, incensed at their refractory behaviour, and hoping to conquer their obstinacy by his presence, repaired in person to Oxford, under pretence of a summer's jaunt or progress; and having summoned the fellows before him, he reproached them in the most virulent terms for their disloyalty, arrogance, and presumption, as he called it; and commanded them forthwith to elect the bishop of Oxford, or prepare to feel the weight of his displeasure; but all his threats were thrown away: the fellows remained firm; and the king having exposed himself to the contempt of the whole nation, returned with shame and confusion to London. The ecclesiastical commissioners, however, were let loose against them, and the president and twenty-five fellows were expelled. Dr. Hough refusing to put the bishop of Oxford in possession of his lodgings, the doors were broke open, Parker was established in the possession of his office, and the deprived fellows had their places supplied by papists.

Of all the violences committed during this reign, this may be said to be the most openly illegal and unjust: accordingly, the nation was now perfectly convinced that the king had nothing less in view than to reduce it to the most abject state of submission. The most bitter reflections, the most pathetic remonstrances, and the loudest complaints against the court, now filled every mouth, or made the subject of almost every publication. James on his side, to show his supreme contempt of all these murmurs of the people, gave a solemn audience to Dada, who had the preceding year been appointed the pope's nuncio in England. He made his public entry as a foreign ambassador at Windsor (where the court then was) on the twenty-third day of July, with all the formality of a popish procession, being preceded by a cross-bearer, carrying his cross erect, and attended by crowds of popish priests and monks in their respective habits. The duke of Somerset, who was at that time in waiting as lord of the bed-chamber, was appointed to introduce the apostolical nuncio to his audience of the king, but refused; alleging as an excuse, that it was high-treason by the laws for any one to assume that character in England. For this refusal the duke was turned out of his post in the bed-chamber, and lost the command of a regiment of dragoons. The nuncio continued to reside at London during the whole of this reign.

It was about this time that father Petre, or Peters, the king's confessor, a shallow bigot, was publicly admitted as a member of the council-board, contrary to the advice of all the leading men among the catholics.

James intended to call a new parliament, and therefore exerted all his influence to get such persons chosen as he thought would prove the most compliant with his measures. He renewed his practice of closeting, in which no arguments, threats, or promises, were omitted to induce them to consent to a formal repeal of the test and other penal laws. The deputy-lieutenants, judges, and justices, in different parts of the kingdom, were set to work to bias the minds of the electors; and those corporations which shewed themselves refractory, were persecuted into compliance by Quo warrantos, new-modelling them, and a thousand other illegal acts of oppression: but after all, such was the disposition of the nation in general, and so great an aversion the people shewed to popery and arbitrary power, that the king, fearing his endeavours would prove ineffectual, would not venture to call another parliament.

It is very observable, that while James was thus labouring to introduce popery, he received into protection, and very charitably relieved, multitudes of French protestants, whom persecution had obliged to fly their native country.

Henry IV. of France had, about a century before, granted an edict, commonly called the Edict of Nantes; securing the protestants in the free exercise ercise of their religion. This edict, which had often been declared irrevocable, and which, during the experience of so long a period, had been productive of no bad consequences, was now revoked by Lewis XIV. who persecuted these unhappy religionists with such rigour and severity, that above half a million of the most useful and industrious subjects deserted France, and carried with them, besides an immense sum of money, those arts and manufactures which had chiefly tended hitherto to enrich that kingdom.

The king, fully sensible of the great popularity the prince of Orange possessed in England, especially amongst the dissenting party; and that the princess his consort was in general revered as the presumptive heir of the crown, was greatly desirous to know their opinion concerning the penal laws and test, not doubting, if he could procure their concurrence to a repeal, it would have great weight with the nation. This matter was at first managed with great secrecy by one Mr. Stuart, who by the king's private direction wrote to Fagel, the pensionary of Amsterdam, to sound the prince and princess on this subject. The answers proved far from agreeable to the court. However, it was confidently given out that the prince and princess had declared their approbation of the repeal. This report reaching the ear of their royal highnesses, Fagel was directed to draw up a letter to the court of England, that might rectify all mistakes, and declare to the world their true opinions. In this letter, dated November 1687, the pensionary declares, that "although their royal highnesses were for a full liberty of conscience, and wished not that any one should be persecuted or punished for differing from the established religion; yet they could by no means consent to the repeal of the test and the other penal laws, which tended to the security of the protestant religion, especially as those laws could not be said to carry in them any severity against the Roman catholics on account of their consciences, being only provisions for qualifying persons for a seat in parliament, or the enjoyment of public offices." The publication of this letter afforded matter of great satisfaction to the nation; but to the king it gave the severest mortification, as it convinced the world how contrary the sentiments of the prince and princess were to those of their father.

Hitherto the protestants had submitted to the violent attacks made upon their civil and religious liberties, from the hope that the king, who was now in his fifty-fifth year, would ere long pay the tribute to nature; and that the princess of Orange, like another Elizabeth, would resettle things on their antient foundation when she should ascend the throne; but their hopes seemed quite extinguished, when a proclamation was published in the Gazette of January 2, 1688, declaring the queen to be with child, and ordering a thanksgiving on that account. The extravagant joy of the papists on this occasion, the sanguine expressions of the jesuits, who gave out that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a pilgrimage made by her majesty's mother (the duchess of Modena) to the chapel of our Lady of Loretto, and that their queen would certainly have a prince, made the generality of the protestants, whose all was now at stake, entertain suspicions of this pregnancy, as a scheme of the papists to establish their religion in England, by imposing an heir on the kingdom. From this time the protestants seem to have banished their forbearing principles, and to have taken up a resolution to oppose the baleful designs of the king and his ministry; nor is it improbable that they now turned their eyes on the prince of Orange, as the only person to whom they could apply to head them in the stand they proposed to make in defence of their liberties and religion.

However this might be, the king was so elevated with this prospect of male issue, that he seemed to set the prince of Orange at defiance, endeavoured by every slight and insult to provoke the Dutch into a war, and at length went so far as to publish a proclamation, recalling all his majesty's subjects that were in the service of the States-General. The prince of Orange, on his side, offered passports to such English or Scottish officers as desired to quit the service, and by this expedient purged the troops of those individuals, of whose attachment and fidelity he was doubtful.

James, still burning with frantic zeal, and a thirst for confirming his despotic power, seemed determined no longer to keep any measures with his subjects. On the twenty-seventh of April, 1688, came out a second declaration for liberty of conscience, almost in the same terms with the former; and an order from the king was subjoined, commanding the clergy, immediately after divine service, to read it in their churches. This was such an insult upon the pastors of the established religion, as could be meant only to drive them to extremities, and then to take advantage of their non-compliance with the royal mandate. Some few of the court-clergy and bishops obeyed, but the far greater number of prelates and ministers unanimously refused obedience. Six bishops, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Ken of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, and Trelawny of Bristol, assembled privately at the archbishop of Canterbury's (Sancroft) palace, and drew up a petition to the king, and, with the primate, went to present it to him on their knees*.

James

* The petition was couched in the following terms: "To the king's most excellent majesty; the humble petition of William archbishop of Canterbury, and divers of the suffragan bishops of that province now present with him, in behalf of themselves, and others of their absent brethren, and of the inferior clergy of their respective dioceses, humbly sheweth,

"That the great averiness they find in themselves to the distributing and publishing in all their churches your majesty's declaration for liberty of conscience, proceeds neither from want of duty and obedience to your majesty (our holy mother the church of England being both in her principles and constant practice unquestionably loyal, and having to her great honour been more than once publicly acknowledged to be so by your gracious majesty) nor yet from any want of tenderness to dissenters; in relation to whom we are willing to come to such a temper as shall be thought fit, when the matter shall be considered and settled in parliament and convocation: but, among many other considerations, from this especially, because that declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power as hath been often declared illegal in parliament, particularly in the years 1662 and 1672, and in the beginning of your majesty's reign; and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, that your petitioners cannot in prudence, honour, or conscience,

James, impatient of controul, and distinguished for obstinacy, which court-sycophants are ever ready to dignify with the name of constancy, resented this opposition to his will in the highest manner: he dismissed the bishops from his presence with a sharp reprimand, telling them, that if they had forgotten he was the supreme head of the church, he knew how to make himself acknowledged as such. Soon after the delivery of the petition, the bishops were summoned before the council: the paper they had delivered was shown to them, and they were required to declare whether or not they were inclinable to own it. This question, which appeared to be intended as a snare, at first startled the bishops: they were silent for a short time; at length the archbishop of Canterbury acknowledged that it had been written by him, and the rest declared they had signed it. The lord-chancellor Jefferies insulted the reverend fathers with his usual brutality: he represented their petition as an attempt to demolish the king's authority, and to disturb the peace of the kingdom; concluding with asking them, if they would give bail to appear in the court of King's-Bench, and answer to the charge which should be brought against them for this libel. The bishops knew too well their own dignity to be thus entrapped: they replied, that their privilege as peers exempted them from the necessity of giving security, on being charged with a misdemeanor; and that they were bound by oath to maintain the rights of the peerage, as well as the rights of the church. Jefferies in a fury told them, that unless they instantly retracted their assertions, and withdrew their petition, he would send them to the Tower. They answered, "That they submitted to his majesty's pleasure, whatever it should be; that their own consciences told them they had acted nothing but what was agreeable to the laws, and the sacred character with which they were invested; and that they depended on the King of kings to be their protector:" whereupon a warrant was issued for their commitment to the Tower, the charge against them being, "For contriving, making, and publishing a seditious libel against his majesty and his government."

No pen can describe the consternation that seized on all ranks of people, when they found these fathers of the church, these noble opposers of tyranny and oppression, were to be dragged away to confinement. The court was aware of the disagreeable consequences such a sight might produce on the part of the populace, and had taken the precaution of ordering the prelates to be conveyed to the Tower from Whitehall by water, in a private manner; but the alarm was gone abroad, and the shore was lined with innumerable spectators, who with one voice deplored their fate, and on their knees intreated their blessing. The good bishops on this occasion increased by their conduct the love their sufferings had begotten; they checked the transports of the multitude; they charged them to continue to fear God, to honour the king, and by no rash act to impeach their loyalty.

In this manner they were conveyed to the place of their confinement, where even the soldiers who were appointed to guard them, moved by the sympathy of example, fell on their knees to ask their benediction, and expressed themselves in the bitterest terms of resentment against their persecutors. The king hearing of this, ordered some other companies to march into the Tower, in whom he had more confidence.

On the tenth of June, two days after the commitment of the bishops, the queen was said to be delivered of a prince, who was baptized by the name of James, and who was very lately alive at Rome, under the name of the Chevalier de St. George, but best known in England by the name of the Pretender. This event, the most joyous that could happen for the catholic party, was notified by public proclamation, and a thanksgiving ordered to be observed throughout the kingdom. However, the people in general were prepossessed with a notion that this was only a trick of the papists to cut off the princess of Orange from the succession; and they were the rather confirmed in this opinion by certain mysterious circumstances, both in respect to the pregnancy and the lying-in; and the management of the court was such as tended rather to increase than remove the suppositions. At the time of the queen's delivery the princess Anne of Denmark was at Bath. She had gone some few weeks before, earnest intreaty, if not command, of her husband, the archbishop of Canterbury was in the country, and the Dutch ambassador, who should have been present as a witness in behalf of the princess of Orange, was not called. In short, the birth of this child, which, according to the common rule of things, ought to have proved the bond of union between the king and his people, had the very contrary effect. Both parties, protestants and catholics, laboured under such violent prejudices at this time, as could not fail to influence their judgments. No wonder, therefore, if we still find the one strenuously asserting the legitimacy of this child, the other asserting the whole affair to be an imposture. Dr. Burnet tells us, that he had it from the mouth of one of the queen's physicians, that she had miscarried in the month of April preceding; and though he does not absolutely assert that this delivery was a trick, yet he talks of it in such a manner, as leaves us very little room to doubt that he thought so, as indeed many others then did, and still continue to do; though this has been carried so far as to pretend, that there were three supposititious children palmed upon the public, one after another, the two former having died in a very few days after each other. The only method to account for this proceeding is, to suppose that several big-bellied women had been brought together, who were each of them alike near their time, in order to have a sufficient supply of children to carry on the imposture. I acknowledge myself wholly at a loss to account for this affair, and therefore shall only observe, that circumstances which at any other time would be so far make themselves parties to it, as the distribution of it all over the nation, and the solemn publication of it once and again, even in God's house, and in the time of his divine service, must amount to in common and reasonable construction:

your petitioners therefore most humbly beseech your majesty, that you will be pleased not to insist upon this distribution and reading of your majesty's said declaration: And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c." Rapin. Echard.

thought to have little or nothing in them, in case of a general suspicion, are usually applied to confirm that suspicion: but indeed this question is now become a matter of mere curiosity. Besides, allowing the prince of Wales, as he was called, to have been the real and genuine son of the king and queen, yet the solemn exclusion of his father, for his attachment to the catholic religion, and his own education in those principles, have as effectually disqualified him from any claim upon the crown of these kingdoms, as if his illegitimacy had been ever so clearly proved. But to return:

The seven imprisoned bishops, after about a week's confinement, demanded the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, which the court either could not, or did not chuse to deny them. They were released from the Tower on the seventeenth of June, being bailed in their own recognizances, the archbishop in two hundred pounds, and the other bishops in one hundred pounds each. Their trial came on the twenty-ninth of the same month, when an infinite croud of people of all ranks attended at Westminster-hall: the cause continued ten hours. Two of the judges, Wright and Allebone, gave their opinion that the petition was a libel; and the two others, Holloway and Powel, that it was not. The jury staid so long out, that the court was adjourned, and the foreman brought in the verdict next morning, that the defendants were Not Guilty: at which words the whole hall resounded with shouts of joy: the news flew instantly through all quarters of the city: bells were rung all day; and the night began and ended with bonfires and illuminations, as if the nation had gained some great and signal victory: a glorious one indeed it was for the protestant religion and the church of England, whose bishops now enjoyed a greater triumph than they had known since the Reformation. The nation seemed desirous to make them amends for the cruel insults it had offered them, when, seduced by the artifices of Cromwell and his party, not quite fifty years before, it had driven them from all rank and dignity in the state, and loaded them with the most bitter contumely, for having observed the same conduct as they did on this occasion.

The rejoicings for the delivery of the persecuted prelates were not confined to the metropolis alone; they reached the camp on Hounslow-heath. The soldiers no sooner received the news of the verdict given by the jury, than, without paying any regard to the presence of the king, who was then dining with lord Feversham in his tent, they burst forth into the most extravagant marks of tumultuous joy. When the king was made acquainted with the reason, he could not conceal his displeasure: he had hitherto fixed his chief dependence on the submission of his army to his will. This incident awakened in his mind several uneasy suspicions: he resolved to be fully satisfied, by putting their attachment to an infallible test; but here he received the greatest mortification of all: for beginning with the lord Litchfield's regiment, which he ordered to be drawn up in his presence, he commanded such officers and soldiers as would not contribute to the repeal of the test and penal laws, to ground their arms; when, to the king's great surprize, the whole regiment, except two captains, and some few popish soldiers, laid down their firelocks; at which he was so astonished, that he stood speechless for some minutes; then bidding them take up their arms, he told them with a fullen air, "That for the future he would not do them the honour to ask their advice." He saw now that it would only be exposing himself to contempt to try the rest of his forces, and therefore had recourse to another method, such as he thought would effectually answer his end: this was, to discard the greatest part of the officers and soldiers who were protestants, and substitute catholics in their place; a scheme which, to the unspeakable happiness of this nation, he had not time to accomplish, though he began it in part, by new-modelling the regiment commanded by his own natural son the duke of Berwick; but this only served to disgust the army the more. The navy shewed itself as little disposed to favour the views of the king as the military had done: for vice-admiral Strickland having ordered mass to be said on board his ship in the Downs, the sailors were enraged to such a degree, that it was with great difficulty they could be hindered from seizing the priests, and throwing them overboard. James, however, still continued obstinate in his purpose; and as he saw that his design of new-modelling the army would be liable to considerable obstructions and delays, he sent for six regiments over from Ireland, the greatest part of them composed of papists in whom he could entirely confide, and ordered three thousand men to advance out of Scotland.

Such was the situation of affairs, when the nation, now fully convinced of the king's designs to subvert the constitution both in church and state, began in earnest to think of means for preserving their religion and liberties from being utterly destroyed; and many persons of eminence and interest in the kingdom, as well clergy as laity, who had gone very great lengths in support of the kingly authority, thought it was better to retract their doctrine of non-resistance and passive obedience, than bring their country to the brink of ruin by an obstinate adherence to it; and entered into a strict union with the non-conformists for their mutual security, and to take measures for inviting over the prince of Orange, in order to put him at the head of the party against the king. The prince no sooner received an intimation of this disposition in the English to shake off the yoke of his father-in-law's government, than he adroitly set himself to work to make his own advantage of it. He had sent over Zuylestein, one of his gentlemen of the bed-chamber, to congratulate James on the birth of his son. This minister had orders to sound some of the principal persons of the kingdom on this great subject. Zuylestein soon informed him that the conjuncture was entirely favourable to his views; that the whole nation were ready to rise, and only wanted a chief to head them. Several of the nobility and gentry going abroad on various pretences*, waited on the prince at the Hague, and con-confirmed this intelligence. As a frequent correspondence passed between England and Holland, the prince of Orange and the English protestants kept up a mutual intercourse, and by letters and messages concerted that plan, which at length was maturated, to the happy deliverance of this nation from a papal yoke.

The situation of affairs in Europe at this time contributed not a little to the success of this design. The manifest partiality of James in favour of the ambitious views of Lewis XIV. had alarmed not only the protestants, but the Roman catholic powers likewise, and they dreaded nothing so much as a firm coalition between the two courts of England and France: they saw no hopes of safety for themselves but in a revolution in this kingdom. Innocent XI. who was known by the name of the Protestant Pope, only on account of the wise disregard he had shewn to the mad attempts of James to introduce popery into England, was, if we may believe contemporary historians, far from being averse to the intended reformation in our government. The design, however, was managed with great secrecy at first, both at London and at the Hague; but when it came to be known, was approved by the whole nation, nay indeed by all Europe, France only excepted. The prince of Orange, however, would not engage in this matter till he had received a formal invitation from such persons whom he knew to have every thing to risque in case of their enterprize miscarrying. This invitation was brought over by Zuylestein on his return from his embassy, and then the prince readily accepted of the proffer made him, to undertake the defence of the nation against the machinations of their sovereign. Would it be a trespass on the regard we owe to William III. to say, that perhaps self-interest, and the desire of reigning over so great a kingdom, contributed as much as his love for liberty and the protestant religion, to induce him to accept of the proffered chieftainship over the discontented English?

It is certain that he could not have chosen a more fortunate time for his enterprize, as the people were then extremely incensed by the imprisonment of the bishops, which was justly considered as a glaring insult, not only to the church, but even to all the protestants in the kingdom.

The leading men who had joined in the invitation of the prince of Orange, dispersed themselves in their different counties, in order to gain the populace in their party, and ripen them into a disposition for a general revolt. All this time, neither the king nor his council seem to have had the least suspicion of what was transacting. William, on his side, conducted the necessary preparations with admirable prudence and policy. Under pretext of interfering in the dispute then on foot between prince Clement of Bavaria, and the cardinal of Furstemberg, about the election of an archbishop of Cologne, he formed an army of nine thousand men, which was encamped near Nimeguen; a fleet of fifty men of war, and a sufficient number of transports, were by degrees assembled in the Dutch harbours, and waited only for orders to take on board the troops designed for the landing in England. All this was transacted with a circumspection and address, that sufficiently evinced the great capacity and abilities of the prince of Orange, who could conceal these public preparations under such pretences, that no one could as yet discover his intentions. Doubtless he was greatly indebted to the complaisance of the States, who on this occasion heartily concurred with him in all his measures. The prince, after he had determined to put himself at the head of the male-content party in England, had desired the English lords at the Hague to demand assistance of the States in the name of all England. Their High Mightinesses did not want much persuasion to yield to a request of this kind: they were equally concerned in the affair with the English themselves, as the ruin of Holland would doubtless have soon followed the slavery of England, considering the designs of Lewis XIV. and his close union with James. Nor was it from his own countrymen only that the prince of Orange received countenance and assistance in this enterprize; many of the neighbouring princes, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony, the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the whole house of Lunenburg, agreed to assemble their forces, and protect the United Provinces, during the absence of their Stadtholder.

It was a considerable time before king James would believe that his son-in-law had conceived any design against him, or that the forces the prince was assembling were destined to invade England. Lewis, however, having received intelligence from the count d'Avaux, his ambassador at the Hague, of what was likely to be the event of these great preparations, transmitted the information to James, and at the same time made him an offer of any number of troops he should think proper for his defence; or that he would immediately send over fifteen thousand men, if the king of England would put Portsmouth into their hands, in order to preserve to them a free communication with France. These affairs were laid before the council; but the earl of Sunderland, who was prime minister, and is, not without reason, supposed to have already entered into a correspondence with the prince of Orange, strenuously opposed the accepting them. He alleged in support of his opinion, that a small body of foreign troops would do more hurt than good, as they would be sufficient to excite the murmurs of the people, but not to keep them in subjection. The English soldiers, he said, naturally averse to be commanded by, or even act in concert with, foreigners, would take every opportunity to desert: that, on the other hand, it would require no less than forty thousand men to prevent or quell the opposition of the discontented part of the nation: that such an army would naturally receive all its orders from the court of France; and while it kept the English under awe, would reduce the king himself to little better than a viceroy to Lewis XIV. These arguments, though dictated by perfidy, carried with them an appearance of sound reasoning: the council subscribed to the minister's opinion, and James refused, though with many expressions of gratitude, this important offer.

Still Lewis was loth to forsake his friend and ally, in whose welfare he considered himself as deeply interested. He sent orders to d'Avaux to remonstrate to the States in his name, against the preparations which they seemed to be making for a descent upon England. The strict friendship and alliance, said the French minister, which subsists between the two monarchs, will make Lewis consider every attempt against his ally as an act of hostility against himself. This remonstrance, far from intimidating, served only to incense the States. They demanded, with great vehemence, What was the purport of the late alliance between France and England, which had been so secretly concluded? Whether it was of the same nature with the former; intended for the destruction of the protestant religion? If it was, it then behoved them instantly to provide for their safety, and to defeat those projects which were formed against them *. James himself was vexed with Lewis for taking this rash step; and finding that he had been advised to it by Skelton, the English envoy at the Hague, he sent for that minister home, and committed him to the Tower, at the same time publicly disclaiming all alliance with France, and his having any knowlege of the memorial. Whatever truth there might be in this assertion, neither the States nor his own subjects gave credit to it: the English in particular were more incensed than ever against their sovereign, whom they firmly believed to have entered into a plan with the French king for reducing them to entire slavery.

While the unhappy James, distracted by a thousand uneasy apprehensions, was considering how best he might retrieve his affairs, he received, towards the end of September, certain advice of the prince of Orange's design, and that he might soon expect to see the Dutch fleet upon his coasts, with a land army on board, accompanied by several English noblemen and gentlemen of distinction, who had hitherto concealed themselves there. James was perfectly thunderstruck at receiving this news: neither himself nor his council could propose any possible means of resisting the invasion. The protestants, who composed the bulk of the nation, he knew, looked upon themselves as victims devoted to ruin, and would therefore naturally join the prince in their own defence: nay, it was more than probable he was coming over upon their express invitation. Both the fleet and land forces had sufficiently discovered their little inclination to support the king in the execution of his designs, or rather their resolution to oppose him to the utmost. What then was to be done? There was little time for deliberation: the storm was driving swiftly on, and it behoved him to have immediate recourse to some shelter against its fury. James then resolved to throw himself upon the church of England, and by revoking several of his late unpopular acts, endeavour to retrieve the good will and affection of his subjects. With this view he consulted immediately with the bishops then in London, abolished the commission for ecclesiastical affairs, took off the bishop of London's suspension, restored the city to its charter, removed popish magistrates and put protestants in their room, and took some other steps towards the redress of grievances. These however had not the desired effect: they came too late, and were generally looked upon as the result of fear, rather than of inclination or a real change of sentiments. James seems to have been at some pains to confirm his people in this opinion; for notwithstanding the present ticklish situation of his affairs, he had the madness to name the pope to be one of the godfathers to his new-born son.

Meanwhile the prince of Orange laboured incessantly at the compleating of his armament; and when all things were in readiness, he published a manifesto, explaining the true motives of his undertaking. Copies of this paper were sent over here, and distributed all over the kingdom. In this declaration the prince solemnly disclaimed all thoughts of conquest, or of disturbing the king, his father-in-law, in the enjoyment of his sovereignty, declaring that his design was only to maintain the protestant laws and liberties of these kingdoms, which had been so openly violated, and to procure the assembling of a free and lawful parliament, that might at once settle all the rights of the subject, and the prerogatives of the crown, on a firm and unalterable basis; and to this, he said, he had been invited "by a great many lords, both spiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and other subjects of all ranks."

At the same time, the States-General published a paper, containing the reasons which had induced them to lend their ships and men to the prince of Orange. These were, the invitations his highness had received from the nobility, gentry, and clergy of England, and the apprehensions that king James, after he should have subjected his own kingdom to his arbitrary will, would join with the French monarch in reducing the United Provinces to slavery, and totally extirpating the protestant religion.

On the twenty-first of October, the prince of Orange set sail for England with the Dutch fleet, consisting of about fifty men of war of the line, twenty-five frigates, as many fire-ships, and between three and four hundred victuallers and transports, having on board four thousand horse and nine thousand foot, and accompanied by the English nobility and gentry already mentioned, and others; with count Nassau, general of the horse; count Solmes, colonel of the foot-guards; count Stirum; Mynheer Bentinck; Mynheer Overquerque; and Mynheer Zuylestein: as also the famous marshal Schomberg, and a great number of French officers, who had left their native country, and taken refuge in Holland on account of religion. Admiral Herbert, who had gone over to the prince from England, led the van of the fleet: the prince commanded in the center, with a flag flying at his main-mast-head, on which were displayed his own arms, and those of his consort, surrounded with this motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION, AND THE LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND: underneath, the words JE MAINTIENDRAI, the device of the house of Nassau. This fleet had sailed but a few leagues when the wind came about to the west, and blew so violent a storm, that in a very few hours there were not four ships to be seen together. The scattered vessels made some for one port, some for another. Happily not one was lost; but upon the news of this disaster arriving here, the court party immediately set their hirelings to work, to represent the fleet as so miserably disabled, that it could not possibly be in a condition to put to sea again till the latter end of the spring. On this occasion James acted as if he had really believed the fiction of his own raising; for he instantly began to recal some of his late popular acts, and thereby discovered what was to be expected from him, if once he should find himself freed from the present danger. Much about this time the king appears to have discovered that the earl of Sunderland had played him false, by holding a correspondence with the prince of Orange; for in this month of October that nobleman was dismissed from his two employments of secretary of state and president of the council. The earl thought proper, some time afterwards, to publish an apology for his conduct.

James had been not a little alarmed at that expression in the prince's manifesto, where he says, "He was earnestly invited over by several of the lords spiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and others:" and thereupon sending for the archbishop, and as many of the prelates as could be assembled, he demanded of them, If that part of the prince's declaration was true? The bishops were a little confounded: however, they replied by many general professions of duty and affection to his majesty. The king then asked them, if they would sign an abhorrence of the intended invasion? adding, that this would be the most convincing proof they could give him of their loyalty, and of eminent service to him in the present posture of affairs, by the effect it would have on the minds of his enemies, both within and without doors. A declaration against the prince of Orange, he said, was then in the press, and nothing retarded the publication but waiting for their paper of abhorrence to be annexed to it. He then dismissed them from his presence, after having assigned them a short day for giving in their answer. On the day appointed the bishops again waited on the king at Whitehall, when, upon their entering the presence, "Well, my lords, asked his majesty with some impatience, Where is your paper?" "We humbly beg of your majesty, replied they, to hold us excused from writing any thing of the nature your majesty was pleased to mention to us, or for making a particular defence to a general accusation, lest we should thereby give the first precedent of that kind against the privilege of peers: moreover, we humbly conceive, that our profession being to promote peace, it belongeth not to us to declare war, especially against a prince so nearly allied to the crown." This answer threw the king into a violent transport of rage; and finding that the prelates continued firm to their resolution, in spite of menaces or soothing, he ordered them to withdraw, not without sensible marks of his displeasure. But to return to the prince of Orange.

The damage the scattered fleet sustained was so small, that the prince was soon in a condition to put to sea again, which he did on November 1, and stood to the northward, intending to land in some part of Yorkshire, near the mouth of the Humber; but the wind blowing strong at east, they put before it, and made to the westward; and on the third of November the fleet entered the Channel, and lay by between Calais and Dover: the king's fleet, under the earl of Dartmouth, lay at anchor at the Gunfleet; but the wind blew so hard, that they could not get under way to assail the enemy. Indeed, it is more than probable that the admiral, knowing the disposition of the seamen in general to be averse to the court and its measures, was apprehensive of putting all upon a stake by a precipitate engagement. Be that as it may, the prince, making sail again, came off the Isle of Wight in the evening; and orders were given not to over-run Dartmouth in the night. The next morning, however, to their great mortification, they found the wind and current, for which they had not made proper allowances, had carried them past both Dartmouth and Torbay. They gave all over now for lost, as they saw nothing left but to winter at Plymouth, or some of the more westerly ports, which would give the king time to provide for his defence in such a manner as might overturn all their projects. In the midst of these disagreeable reflections, the wind on a sudden flew about to the south, and carried the whole fleet in less than four hours into Torbay. The infantry was landed that evening; and their debarkation was hardly completed, when the wind, shifting again, blew a storm from the west, which prevented the Lord Dartmouth's pursuing them. The Dutch fleet lay so land-locked, that the gale had no effect upon it: the English, on the contrary, unable to keep the sea, were obliged to run into harbour for safety. This is the substance of Dr. Burnet's account of this expedition, who was on board the fleet in quality of prince's chaplain*.

The prince, having refreshed his troops, put them in march, and advanced to Exeter, which city he entered on the 8th of November. He remained there till the 15th, without being joined by any person of condition, insomuch that his spirit again began to flag; and it was actually debated in the council, whether they should not reembark, and return to Holland. But at length Sir Edward Seymour, Major Barrington, and several other gentlemen of the county of Devon and Somerset, made their appearance at his highness's quarters with tenders of their assistance. The prince received them with the greatest politeness and cordiality. Soon after he had the satisfaction of finding himself joined by the earl of Abington, the Lord Russell (son to the earl of Wharton), Mr. Godfrey, and Mr. Howe; and to hear, that the Lord Delamere had taken arms for him in Cheshire; that the earl of Danby had secured York, and with the earl of

* This right reverend father tells us, that going to the prince's quarters after landing, his highness took him by the hand, and asked him, if he did not believe in predestination? To which the doctor replied, "He could never forget that providence which had appeared so signally for them." Burnet.

This circumstance of the same wind being favourable to the Dutch, and unfavourable to the king's fleet, gave occasion to apply the two famous lines of Claudian to the prince of Orange:

"O! nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat æther,
"Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti."

Which may be thus rendered:

O youth! high favour'd of indulgent heaven,
To whom the winds for ministers are given!

Bath, governor of that city, had declared in his favour. The earl of Devonshire did the same in Derby. In fine, every day furnished fresh instances of the attachment of the nation to a prince whom they now looked upon as their deliverer from popery and arbitrary power. Sir Edward Seymour, upon his first coming in, had drawn up an association, in the name of himself and friends, to stand by the prince and one another in the cause they had engaged in, which was afterwards signed by great numbers of all ranks throughout the kingdom.

Upon the first news of the prince's landing, the two archbishops, with five other prelates; the dukes of Grafton and Ormond; the earls of Dorset, Clare, Clarendon, Rochester, Burlington, and Anglesey; the lords Newport, Paget, Chandois, and Ossulston, all of them then residing in London, drew up a petition to his Majesty; "intreating him to call with all speed a free parliament, and to take some measures for satisfying the prince of Orange, and for preventing the effusion of Christian blood." This petition was presented on the 17th of November by the two archbishops and the bishops of Ely and Rochester. The king returned an answer, in which he assured them, that there was nothing he more passionately desired than to have a free parliament; and that, as soon as the prince of Orange should have quitted the realm, he would convoke such an one; but could not think of doing it while an enemy was in the heart of the kingdom, and could command so many returns.

The same day the king set out for Salisbury, where his army had its head-quarters, with a view to oppose the prince. On his arrival in the camp, he had the mortification to hear, that the Lord Cornbury, son to the earl of Clarendon, and colonel of the dragoons, had carried with him his own regiment and three others to the prince at Exeter. The other principal officers of the army gave his majesty to understand by their general, the earl of Feversham, that though they were ready to stand by his majesty to the last drop of their blood on any other occasion, they could not answer to their consciences to fight against a prince who was come over to secure to them the enjoyment of their religion and properties. Soon after the duke of Grafton, and several other officers of distinction, went over to the prince; and James finding that there was no relying upon his troops, and probably apprehensive that they might deliver him up to his son-in-law, set out for London, after having published a proclamation, promising pardon to all his subjects who had taken up arms, if they would return to their duty. On his way back to his capital, he was deserted by the prince of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, and, what was still more extraordinary, by the Lord Churchill, who had owed his whole fortune to the king's bounty, by whom he had been raised from the rank of a page to an high command in the army, and had afterwards been created a peer. This ingratitude was deeply felt by James, but a more severe blow awaited him; for when he arrived at Whitehall, he understood that his daughter, Anne princess of Denmark, had left the town the night before, and, with the bishop of London, was gone to join the prince. The wretched king was no way prepared for so astonishing an event. He burst into tears when he received the affecting news; and, in the distress of his heart, he exclaimed, "God help me! my own children have forsaken me."

The prince of Orange, having received advice of the king's return to London, advanced with his army to Sherborn, and from thence to Salisbury, where he made a triumphant entry, the king's forces having before retired to Reading. In this distress the king assembled all the Protestant peers about town, and desired their advice*, who proposed the calling a free parliament, and to send commissioners to treat with the prince. This the king readily complied with; the lord chancellor was directed to issue out writs accordingly; Papists were removed from the posts and offices they held about the court; Sir Edward Hales, lieutenant of the Tower, who was one of that communion, was displaced, and succeeded by Sir Bevil Skelton; and father Peters, the king's confessor, seeing the storm rise so high, wisely consulted his safety by an escape into France.

The marquis of Halifax, the earl of Northampton, and the Lord Godolphin, were sent to treat with the prince, who delivered to them a paper containing certain proposals, the substance whereof was, that a free parliament should be called; that all Papists should be disarmed, and dispossessed of all employments they enjoyed; that all proclamations against himself should be recalled; that the command of the Tower should be put into the hands of the lord-mayor; that if the king should think proper to reside in London during the time of the session of parliament, the prince should likewise reside in the same place with an equal number of guards, or that the king and he should reside at an equal distance from London; that each army should be removed thirty miles from the city, and that no new forces should be brought into the kingdom; that Tilbury-fort should be put into the hands of the city magistrates; that, until the parliament should meet, part of the revenue should be assigned for the maintenance of the prince's army; and that, in order to prevent an invasion from abroad, Portsmouth should be committed to the charge of some person equally agreeable to the king and the prince.

When these proposals were presented to James, he affected to think them as moderate, or even more so than he could have expected in the present posture of his affairs; but in all probability his real sentiments were otherwise, and that finding himself attacked and pursued by one of his son-in-law, abandoned by the other, deserted by his own daughters and bosom friends, and hated by his subjects, he looked upon his fortune as desperate, and therefore resolved upon flight, the last resource of a vanquished prince. It is said he was chiefly instigated to this resolution by his popish counsellors, who dreaded nothing so much as the

* We are told, that on this occasion the king, addressing himself to the earl of Bedford, "My lord, said he, you are a good man, have great influence, and can do me signal service." "Alas! replied the earl, I am a feeble old man, very incapable of performing any considerable service; but I had a son, he added with a sigh, who, if now alive, could serve your majesty in a more effectual manner." He alluded to Lord Russell, who, towards the end of the late reign, had fallen a sacrifice to the king's (then duke of York's) vengeance. James was so thunderstruck with this answer, that he remained for some time speechless. Burnet. Hume.

meeting of a parliament, where they were conscious they should be rendered incapable of ever having any share in the administration again, and perhaps punished for their attempts to subvert the government and the established religion.

By whatever motives James was actuated, it is certain, that while every thing seemed to tend to an accommodation, and that the nobility were ordered to assemble to agree upon measures for re-establishing the peace of the kingdom; the king, having sent away the queen and the prince privately to Gravesend, from whence they took shipping, and passed over to France, on the eleventh of December disappeared himself in the night-time, accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Labadie. He left a letter behind him for his general, the earl of Feverham, wherein he says, "if he could have relied upon all his troops, he should not have been driven to this extremity, and would at least have hazarded one battle for the maintenance of his crown and dignity; but as matters stood with the army, he thought it madness to venture himself at their head against the prince of Orange: he thanked the general and all the officers that had been true to him; desired them not to hazard their lives and fortunes by an unavailing opposition; only cautioning them not to enter into an association against him."

Nothing could equal the surprize which seized the city, the court, and the kingdom, upon the discovery of the king's flight. The more effectually to increase the confusion which James knew must be the natural consequence of his taking such a step, he named not any one who should in his absence conduct the affairs of the public: he threw the great seal into the river; he burned all the writs which had been made out for the election of a new parliament; and caused a caveat to be entered against making use of those that were actually issued. Feverham was no sooner informed of his majesty's retreat, than he disbanded the troops which were in the neighbourhood; and, without either paying or disarming them, let them loose to pillage and plunder at pleasure. The London mob now drew together, and pulled down the mass-houses; and the houses of some foreign ambassadors did not escape their fury, from a notion that many rich Catholics had deposited their most valuable effects there. Jefferies, the chancellor, who had hid himself in disguise at a house in Wapping, waiting for a ship to carry him over to France, was discovered and seized by them, and treated so severely, that the lord-mayor sent him to the Tower to prevent his being pulled in pieces. There he died shortly after of the bruises he had received, and so escaped the exemplary punishment he had so notoriously deserved. What still increased the confusion, was a report that prevailed, at one and the same instant, all over England, on the 12th of December, that the disbanded Irish soldiers of Feverham's army were burning of towns and cutting of throats every-where, and that nothing less than a general massacre of the Protestants was expected: the people were at their wits end; the city was illuminated, that the enemy might not take the advantage of the darkness to surprize it; and every man was in arms, to defend his family from the insults of the cruel Irish. But the next day discovering the falsity of the report, the people recovered from their consternation. It is generally supposed this was a stratagem made use of to create in the people a dread of popery and of King James's administration. If so, it certainly answered all the ends of the contrivers; and did more towards preventing that king's restoration, than the prince of Orange's troops.

In this public exigency the lords, both spiritual and temporal, then in London, together with some persons of distinction, held a consultation in Guildhall with the lord-mayor and aldermen. They resolved to adhere to the prince of Orange, and sent deputies to him with this resolution, subscribed by all the members of the assembly. They then took the keys of the Tower from Skelton, and appointed the Lord Lucas governor of that fortress till the prince's pleasure should be known. They also published a proclamation, as did likewise the prince of Orange, requiring the officers of the army to re-assemble the disbanded troops, and wait in quarters for further orders; the day after which, viz. on the 14th of December, his royal highness the prince arrived at Windsor in his way to London to settle with the lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, on a supposition that the king had gone over to the continent, and entirely resigned the reins of government; but to the no small surprize and indeed mortification of the prince of Orange, news suddenly arrived, that his majesty had been discovered at Feverham, in Kent, on board a ship in which he was waiting for a fair wind to carry him over to France; and that after suffering several indignities from the populace of the place, who, not knowing his person, had mistaken him for some Papist of quality making his escape, he was brought on shore, and lodged in the town. The peers, hearing his majesty was still in his dominions, sent down four of their number, viz. the earls of Middleton, Aylesbury, Yarmouth, and Feverham, with a detachment of the guards, to attend his majesty to London, whither he returned on the 16th of December. The populace, touched with compassion for his unhappy fate, received him with shouts and acclamations of joy. An express was immediately dispatched to the prince of Orange, to acquaint him with the return of his majesty to his capital. How little agreeable this intelligence was to his highness, may be gathered from his actually sending Mynheer Zuylestein to desire the king would approach no nearer than Rochester; but the message arrived too late. Indeed, Dr. Burnet scruples not to assure us, "That the prince of Orange had much rather his father-in-law had met with no interruption in his intended voyage."

The king, being come to Whitehall, began to resume his former authority; and the same night caused an order of council to be published for suppressing tumults, and preventing the demolishing and plundering of houses, and other kinds of outrages. The next day he sent an invitation to the prince by the earl of Feverham to come to St. James's Palace with what number of guards he should think proper, that they might confer together for the redress of the grievances complained of. The only answer his highness returned to this message, was the detaining the bearer, the earl of Feverham, prisoner. The Dutch guards were ordered to take possession of Whitehall, and to turn out all the English; the lords Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere, were sent, in the prince's name, name, at midnight, requesting him to remove early in the morning to Ham, a seat of the duchess of Lauderdale's. The wretched James had by this time lost all remains of spirit or resolution: he patiently submitted to the ignominious treatment offered him (for such it certainly was, however partial prejudice may have varnished it over), and contented himself with requesting that he might be allowed to remove to Rochester instead of Ham. This was readily granted: it was indeed the very thing the ruling powers designed to bring about: they had readily foreseen, that by convincing him he was no longer regarded as a sovereign, and even alarming him with fears for his personal safety, they urged him into that measure which was most suitable for answering their purposes, a second flight. It is plain that the stratagem succeeded; for the king, after loitering a few days at Rochester under the protection of a Dutch guard, and seeing no likelihood of being invited to keep possession of the throne, privately embarked, on the 23d of December, on board a frigate in the river, which, after a short passage, landed him safely at Ambleteuse in Picardy, from whence he repaired to St. Germain, where he was received by the French monarch with the greatest marks of friendship and esteem.

King James left a paper behind him, containing his reasons for withdrawing a second time; wherein he says, "The world could not wonder at his conduct, after the prince of Orange had made the earl of Feversham prisoner, whom he sent to treat in a friendly manner with him, and commanding his own guards to take possession of Whitehall at eleven at night, without acquainting him with it; and even sending him an order at midnight, when he was a-bed, to be gone. After this, he had little to hope for from one who had invaded his kingdom, and called the legitimacy of his son in question, appealing to all that knew him, and even to the prince himself, if they could believe him guilty of so unnatural a villainy. He said he was born free, and desired to remain so; and for that reason had withdrawn himself again, but so as to be within call, whenever the nation's eyes should be open, to see how they had been abused and imposed upon by the specious pretences of religion and property *."

Such was the farewell which James II. took of his subjects, after having governed them three years, nine months, and eleven days; and here we may properly fix the period of this unfortunate monarch's reign, which might have been as happy as any of his predecessors, had not his mistaken notions of prerogative, his excessive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an inflexible severity of temper, hurried him into measures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people, who could no longer submit to a prince, whom they saw altogether guided by the violent counsels of a popish jesuitical faction, and blindly adopting their enslaving superstition.

Of fourteen children this king had by his two wives, Anne Hyde, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and Maria d'Este, daughter to the duke of Modena, three only survived him, viz.

Mary, his eldest daughter, born the thirtieth of April, 1662, and married to William-Henry of Nassau, prince of Orange, afterwards king of England.

Anne, his second daughter, both by his first wife, born the sixth day of February, 1664, and married to his royal highness George prince of Denmark, second son to Frederick III. king of Denmark, afterwards queen of England.

By his second queen he had one son;

James Francis Edward (whose birth was disputed) known commonly by the title of the Chevalier de St. George, and in England by the name of the Pretender, who fixed his residence at Rome, where he died in the month of February of this present year 1766, aged seventy-eight.

King James the Second's natural issue was as follows:

By Mrs. Arabella Churchill, sister of John duke of Marlborough, afterwards married to colonel Godfrey, he had, 1. James Fitz-James, grandee of Spain, mareschal of France, knight of the Golden Fleece, commonly called duke of Berwick, outlawed in 1695.

2. Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the Grand Prior, born 1673, outlawed in 1695; lieutenant-general and admiral of the French galleys. He died in France, December 7, 1702.

3. Henrietta, born 1670, who married Henry lord Waldegrave, 1683.

By Mrs. Catherine Sedley, daughter of sir Charles Sedley, baronet, created baroness of Darlington, and countess of Dorchester, afterwards married to Collier, earl of Portmore, he had Catherine Darnley, born 1681. She married, first, James Annesley, earl of Anglesey, in October 1699; and after his death, secondly, John Sheffield duke of Buckinghamshire and Normandy, March 1, 1705; by whom she had Edmund duke of Buckingham, born January 11, 1716, who died in 1742.

INTER

INTERREGNUM, or rather the Prince of ORANGE'S ADMINISTRATION.

AS soon as king James had thus left the kingdom, the lords took upon themselves the government, and meeting in their house, chose lord Halifax their speaker. On the twenty-fifth of December, they agreed to address the prince of Orange to take upon him the administration of all public affairs till a convention should meet; for which they desired him to issue out letters to the several counties, cities, or boroughs, directing them to chuse such a number of persons to represent them as were of right to be sent to parliament. They also issued an order for all papists to depart ten miles from the city of London, and not to remove above five miles from their habitations in the country. In order to give the greater weight to the proceedings of the lords, the prince of Orange published an order, desiring all such persons as had been members in any of king Charles II's parliaments, and also the lord mayor and aldermen, with fifty of the common-council of the city of London, to meet him at St. James's on the twenty-sixth of December, which they accordingly did (there being about one hundred and sixty of the old members) and repairing to the commons house, his highness made a speech to them, desiring their advice likewise as to the calling a free parliament, and the settlement of the nation. Whereupon this assembly resolved upon the like addresses for calling a convention, and requesting the prince to take upon him the administration of the government, as the lords had done. The prince returned an answer severally to the lords and commons, signifying his compliance with their request; and then the executive power was lodged in the hands of his highness, by the unanimous consent of the great assembly of the nation.

His first acts of authority were, the issuing a declaration for the better collecting the public revenue, for withdrawing the Dutch troops out of their respective quarters to have the elections free, and another order, prohibiting all soldiers quartering in private houses, without the owners consent. He sent orders to Mr. Barillon, the French ambassador, to depart the kingdom in twenty-four hours; and on the thirty-first of December published a proclamation, authorizing all justices of the peace, and other officers (not being papists) to act in their respective places till the meeting of the convention, or orders to the contrary. He borrowed 200,000 l. of the city of London to pay the forces that had been disbanded by the earl of Feversham, and re-assembled again; and he summoned the Scottish gentry and nobility about town to attend at St. James's the seventh of January, which they did, to the number of one hundred and ten, and joined in the like address to his highness, with regard to the administration of all public affairs in Scotland, as the nobility and gentry of England had done with respect to their country; at the same time requesting that his highness would be pleased to summon a general meeting of the states for the fourteenth of March next ensuing. The prince returned them an answer, as he had done to the English: and at the same time, in compliance with one part of the address of the lords and commons, he directed his attention towards the state of affairs in Ireland, and sent a summons to the earl of Tyrconnel, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, to submit to the present administration; but that nobleman, preferring his fidelity to his lawful sovereign to all other considerations, paid no regard to this citation.

In the mean time, the elections for members to compose the ensuing convention, went on rapidly in favour of the prince of Orange's party, though it must be allowed that the general disposition of the nation operated wholly in this choice, there not being the least shadow of restraint used for that purpose; and on the twenty-second of January, 1689, that assembly met. The lords again chose the marquis of Halifax for their speaker, and the commons put Mr. Powle into their chair. To the two houses thus assembled, the prince of Orange sent severally the following letter:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have endeavoured to the utmost of my power to perform what was desired from me, in order to the public peace and safety, and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted since the administration of affairs was put into my hands: it now lieth upon you to lay a foundation for the firm security of your religion, your laws, and your liberties. I do not doubt that by such a full and free representative of the nation as is now met, the ends of my declaration will be attained; and since it hath pleased God hitherto to bless my good intentions with so great success, I trust in him that he will compleat his whole work, by sending a spirit of peace and union to influence our councils, that no interruption may be given to a happy and lasting settlement.

"The dangerous condition of the protestants in Ireland requiring a large and speedy succour, and the present state of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unseasonable divisions among yourselves, nothing can be so fatal as too great a delay in your consultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to secure this nation, may suddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the service of their troops which are now here, and of your early assistance against a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war against them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon such exigences, so I am confident that their chearful concurrence to preserve this kingdom, with so much hazard to themselves, will meet with all the returns of friendship and assistance which may be expected from you as protestants and Englishmen, whenever their condition will require it.

Given at St. James's, the twenty-second day of January, 1689." *

This letter being read, both houses joined in an address to the prince, acknowledging him, under God, the deliverer of the nation, approving of his taking the administration of the government, and praying him to continue it. They then appointed a general thanksgiving, for the late happy deliverance from popery and slavery, and ordered a particular prayer to be inserted therein for the prince of Orange.

In the mean time, the fugitive king, who with his queen and son were most generously treated by Lewis XIV. behaved in such a manner as rendered him the object of contempt to all Europe. He kept no company but with jesuits: he made them daily visits at their college in St. Anthony's-street in Paris: he told them that he was one of their fraternity, and as such desired their prayers; and, what is still more extraordinary, he said the truth. He had got himself admitted into this order with certain ceremonies, by four English jesuits, when duke of York. This weakness of mind in a prince, joined to the manner in which he had, or at least was likely to lose his crown, rendered him so despicable, that the French courtiers diverted themselves with making songs and lampoons on him; nor did his being a Catholic, and having sacrificed his all for that faith, gain him the more esteem. The archbishop of Rheims, brother of Louvois the minister, said openly in James's anti-chamber at St. Germain's, "Is not this a pious man to give up three kingdoms for a mass *?"

In the midst of these humiliations, Lewis endeavoured to buoy up his spirits by his immense liberality, and the noble preparations which he made for restoring him to his throne. James, somewhat roused from his lethargy by this generous and spirited conduct of his old friend and ally, or perhaps sensible of the prejudice his flight had done him, endeavoured to prevent the consequences, and, if possible, recal his subjects to a sense of their duty, and of the royal character he still bore, by writing two letters to the houses of the convention, nearly to the purport of that he had left behind him at Rochester, only adding a promise, on the word of a king, that he would, on his return to England, call a free parliament: he required their advice "what was fit to be done by him towards his returning;" and concluded with assurances of a pardon and act of oblivion to all his subjects who had departed from their allegiance, some few only excepted. These letters, however, were returned unopened by each of the houses. Whether or not these proposals from a king, who, great as might be his demerits, had not as yet been legally deposed, deserved some degree of notice from his subjects, I leave others to determine. A doubt of James's sincerity, and their fears for the Protestant religion, probably got the better of all regard to decorum on this occasion, as the resolutions they soon after came to seem to evince.

The commons having for some days discontinued their sitting, met not again till the 28th of January, to give time to some of the members, then on the road, to come up to London. On that day Mr. Dolben made a long speech to prove the vacancy of the throne by the voluntary desertion of king James, when, after a debate of four or five hours, the house passed this memorable vote:

"That king James II. having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the government; and that the throne is thereby become vacant."

The next day the commons farther voted, "That it hath been found by experience to be inconsistent with this protestant kingdom to be governed by a popish prince."

In the upper house, however, things did not go on quite so smoothly. There was a strong party for a regency, among whom the earl of Nottingham was the chief. After great debates, it was carried to put the word "deserted" in the room of "abdicated," and to leave out the words "and that the throne is thereby become vacant." This occasioned a most memorable conference between the two houses. After many long and learned arguments on each side, a new sovereign was preferred to a regent, by a majority of two voices only (51 to 49). Twelve bishops were for a regency, and two only on the other side the question; Dr. Compton, bishop of London, and sir Jonathan Trelawny, bishop of Bristol. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was a timorous man, absented himself from the house, that he might not be obliged to give his opinion on the subject. In fine, the lords concurred with the votes of the commons, "That king James had abdicated the government, and thereby the throne was become vacant;" and thereupon the convention were determined to declare the princess of Orange, the next Protestant heiress, queen. But Dr. Burnet informs us, that "the earl of Danby sending over to the princess, to give her an account of their debates, and to let her know, if she desired it, he did not doubt they should be able to set her alone upon the throne; she returned for answer, that she was the prince's wife, and would never be other than what she should be in conjunction with him and under him; and should take it very unkindly of any one that should endeavour to separate their interests." The doctor adds, "that she sent the lord Danby's letter and her answer to the prince, who, being now assured of the consent of the princess under her hand, sent for the earl of Danby, together with the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Shrewsbury; and gave them to understand, that, though some were for putting the princess on the throne singly, he would neither think of holding it by apron-strings, nor would he take any share in the government, unless it was lodged in his own person for term of life; though he would consent that the issue of the princess Anne should succeed before the issue he might have by any other wife but the princess."

This resolution of his highness, according to the doctor, put an end to all the debates in the convention; and the two houses at last agreed, and each voted apart, that the prince and princess of Orange should reign jointly as king and queen of England; and that the administration should be in the hands of the prince alone. This vote, according to Dr. Burnet, was not carried without a great opposition. Echard says it passed by twenty voices, sixty-five against forty-five.

On the 12th day of February the princess of Orange (who had been sent for over by her husband) arrived in London from Holland; and the next day both prince and princess, being seated on two large chairs under a canopy of state in the

Banqueting-house, both houses of the convention waited on them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, assembled at Westminster, "a declaration of their rights*," which had been violated by king James; which declaration concluded thus:

"Having therefore an entire confidence that his said highness the prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the violation of their rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled at Westminster, do resolve, That William and Mary, prince and princess of Orange, be, and be declared king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to them the said prince and princess during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the royal power be only in, and executed by, the said prince of Orange, in the names of the said prince and princess, during their joint lives; and after their decease the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdom and dominions to be to the heir of the body of the said princess; and for default of such issue, to the princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for the default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of the said prince of Orange."

This declaration being read, the marquis of Halifax, as speaker of the upper house, made a solemn tender of the crown to their highnesses, in the name of the peers and commons of England, which was accepted in a most obliging manner by their highnesses; and the same day they were proclaimed by the names of William and Mary, king and queen of England †.

OF RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

SEVERAL ecclesiastical matters having been purposely omitted, that the narration of civil affairs might not be interrupted, it will now be requisite to relate the progress of the reformed religion among us from the death of queen Elizabeth, where we last reviewed it; and to give some short account of the religious differences in the church, from that period to the time when the prince of Orange, at the instance of the nobility and people, deserted by their king, took upon himself the government of this realm.

James I. who wished for nothing so much as to settle the peace of the church, and heal those differences of religion which had occasioned a separation amongst the members of the church, several of whom, the people of the same county, of the same religion, and of the same judgment and doctrine, had parted communion on account of a few habits and ceremonies, did, in the very first year of his reign, appoint a conference to be holden at Hampton-Court before himself; to which several eminent prelates and dignified clergy of the

* The rights of the people herein asserted were as follow:

"1. That the pretended power of suspending laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal.

"2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

"3. That the commission for erecting the late court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

"4. That levying of money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal.

"5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning is illegal.

"6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of parliament, is against law.

"7. That the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

"8. That elections of members of parliament ought to be free.

"9. That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament.

"10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted.

"11. That jurors ought to be duly impanelled and returned; and jurors which pass upon men in trials of high-treason, ought to be freeholders.

"12. That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction, are illegal and void.

"13. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently."

"And they do claim, demand, and insist upon, all and singular the premises as their undoubted rights and liberties; and no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people, in any of the said premises, ought in any-wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example." Burnet. Rapin. Echard.

† On this occasion the former oaths of allegiance and supremacy were abrogated, and the following ordered to be taken by all persons, instead of them:

"I, A. B. do solemnly promise and swear, That I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to their majesties king William and queen Mary. So help me God."

"I, A. B. do swear, That I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, the damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated by the pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, that no foreign prince, person, prelate, potentate, or state, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God."

church

church of England were summoned on the one side, and four of the principal divines of the dissenters on the other*.

The conferences were opened on the fourteenth day of January 1604, when his majesty signified to the ministers the cause of his calling them together, and desired the dissenters to produce their objections against the present government of the church; whereupon Dr. Reynolds, who was their spokesman, gave in a paper containing the following heads:

1. That the doctrine of the church might be preserved in purity, according to God's word.
2. That good pastors might be planted in all churches to preach the same.
3. That the church-government might be sincerely administered, according to the word of God.
4. That the book of Common Prayer might be fitted more to the increase of piety.

Out of these heads he framed several points, which he insisted on as necessary for the furtherance of true religion, and perfecting a lasting union among the members of the protestant faith. In the first place, he moved, that confirmation might not be confined to bishops alone; but that any minister might confirm in his own parish. This was thought to circumscribe too much the episcopal jurisdiction, and to be a step towards bringing in presbyterian government, which James of all things disliked; and the bishop of Winchester challenged Dr. Reynolds to produce one instance of confirmation having been ever conferred, either in antient or modern times, by any other of the clergy than bishops.

Dr. Reynolds then made another motion, viz. "That there might be a new translation of the Bible; alledging, that the present version was very corrupt, and in many places directly contradictory to the sacred original." Of this he brought many striking examples, which proved so satisfactory to the whole convocation, that it was generally agreed to have a new translation, which was soon after carried into execution under the eye of the king himself, and is the same that we now use.

After several other points moved by Dr. Reynolds, but not of sufficient importance to demand a place here, he came at last to subscription; requesting that it might not be exacted as heretofore; many good men, he said, not being able to comply with it for certain reasons; the principal of which was, because the apocryphal books are appointed to be read by the Common-prayer book, notwithstanding that in some of them are manifest errors, and such as are directly repugnant to the Scriptures, which are the word of faith. To this the king himself answered, That as he would not wish all canonical books to be read in the church, unless there was some learned person to interpret their true sense and meaning to the hearers, so he was not for enforcing the lecture of any apocryphal ones, in which there was any notorious error; but, at the same time, he declared, that as there were some of them that were clear and correspondent to the Scriptures, and served to illustrate several passages only slightly touched upon by the inspired writers, he thought it proper to admit them; but under such restrictions as the bishop or clergyman should, at the time of reading, think proper to point out to the people.

Another scruple brought by Dr. Reynolds was concerning the sign of the cross in baptism. The doctor acknowledged the sign of the cross in baptism to have been constantly in use, since the apostles time, at entering and going out of the church, and at prayers and benedictions; but doubted of the antient use of it in baptism. To this objection the bishop of Winchester replied, that in Constantine's time it was used in baptism; and the dean of Westminster shewed out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Origen, and others, that in their time it was used "in immortali lavacro," which could be nothing but baptism. The king declared, that he thought this antiquity sufficient to warrant the continuance of it still.

At length Mr. Knewstubbs moved how far an ordinance of the church was to bind them, without impeachment of their Christian liberty. The king was greatly offended with this postulatam: he told Mr. Knewstubbs, that he would not condescend to argue that point with him, and wondered how he could presume to doubt him; for he was bound to obey what the church had once ordained. Dr. Reynolds added, that the sign of the cross ought to be laid aside, if for no other reason than the great abuse that had been made of it in the time of popery, to the raising a spirit of superstition in weak minds. He was answered by the king, that the very reason he alledged for the laying aside this ceremony, was the strongest imaginable in favour of its being retained; for if, added his majesty, it was, as you say, abused to the purposes of superstition in the time of popery, this plainly implies that it was rightly used in its primitive ordination.

The next thing objected was the wearing of the surplice. To this it was answered, that as it appears, from the earliest authorities of the Christian church, that in the celebration of divine service the ministers wore, by way of distinction, a different habit than at other times; and that this habit was of white linen; there was no reason, were it only for the sake of decency and order, that it might not be continued. The managers for the dissenters, however, continued to enforce their objections; and requested, that, in regard of some tender consciences, the surplice and the cross in baptism might not be urged: but the king remained inflexible on that head; telling them, that he was afraid their refusal proceeded rather from obstinacy than tenderness of conscience; and therefore, if they continued refractory, they must take the consequences.

Many other points were handled, as about predestination, absolution, and remission of sins; baptizing by women; about the words in marriage, "with my body I thee worship;" the oath "ex officio;" the high commission, and others; in all which the king's decision went clearly against the dissenters, who, finding they had as little chance in this conference as the protestants had in those held by queen Mary, or the papists under Elizabeth, retired with an appearance of submission.

that all persons should stand, "ipso facto," excommunicated who should affirm the church of England not to be a true or apostolical church, or the liturgy corrupt, or the rites and ceremonies thereof to be anti-christian; as also any such person who should separate from the church, or should pretend that any sect of ministers and lay-persons may make rules, orders, and constitutions, without the king's authority. This was a most severe blow upon all recusants and dissenters from the established church, many of whom suffered the greatest hardships, rather than comply with the injunctions laid on them, or subscribe to terms which in their consciences they thought erroneous. Two persons were burnt for heresy in king James's reign; one was Bartholomew Legat, an Arian, with whom the king himself, and some bishops, held a conference, but without being able to convince him of his errors; whereupon he was declared an obdurate heretic, and delivered over to the secular power, who sentenced him to the flames; and he was burnt in Smithfield on the 18th of March, 1613. The next month one Edward Wightman, of Burton upon Trent, was convicted of heresy, and suffered death at the stake with great resolution. In 1622 one John Trask was condemned to the like punishment; but the constancy of the two former sufferers had made such an impression on the spectators, that it was thought not advisable to repeat executions of that horrible kind; and the poor wretch, by a mercy that had more of policy than humanity in it, was permitted to linger out a miserable life in the cells of Newgate*.

Towards the latter end of this reign, the Arminian or Remonstrant tenets began to spread in England. As Arminianism, by its doctrine, tended to exalt the prerogative above law, no wonder that the court espoused its cause; but all those who adhered to the cause of liberty powerfully opposed it; whereupon all such, though ever so good churchmen, were branded by the court with the name of Puritans. Hence the distinction of State or Doctrinal Puritans, and Discipline Puritans or Disciplinarians. By this means the Puritans acquired great strength for the bulk of the people, and the clergy were at once confounded with them. At the head of the Arminians was Laud; the chief of the Doctrinal Puritans was archbishop Abbot.

In the first year of the reign of Charles I. the church was exalted to the highest degree of splendor. Episcopacy was declared to be of apostolical, and consequently of divine, institution; and the presbyterian government, though challenging the title of Christ's kingdom and ordinance, was declared to have no foundation in scripture, nor in the practice of the church, for one thousand five hundred years. The clergy were all obliged, on pain of deprivation, to swear, that "they approved the doctrine and discipline of the church, and would never consent to alter the government of it by archbishops, bishops, deans, and archdeacons, &c." This oath was framed and enjoined in a convocation in this king's thirteenth year, 1637, which was authorised by the great seal of England, to sit as a synod, a month after the parliament was dissolved. The proceedings of this synod were generally condemned as illegally passed, to the prejudice of the fundamental liberty of the subject; but against the oath many exceptions were made, some of which we shall insert.

Secondly, The words "we will never consent to alter the government of the church," were disliked, as if the same tended to abridge the liberty of the king and state in future parliaments and convocations. Goodman, bishop of Gloucester, the day before the ending of the synod, went to the archbishop of Canterbury, and acquainted him, that he could not in his conscience subscribe the canons enacted by the convocation, while all of them tended to exalt the royal prerogative beyond the just limits; upon which he was committed for some time prisoner to the Gate-house.

Archbishop Laud, instead of indulging the puritans, widened the breach between them and the church, by introducing many new and pompous ceremonies into the public worship; the churches were adorned with paintings, images, altar-pieces, &c. and instead of communion-tables, altars were set up, and bowings to them and the sacramental elements enjoined, and the doctrines of Arminianism were encouraged and propagated. These innovations were loudly complained of by the Puritans, who taxed the authors of them with a design to introduce popery. Their opposition, however, only brought persecution upon them: an implicit conformity was enforced with all the terrors of the High-commission court, to the ruin of many families, and the raising dangerous disturbances in several parts of the kingdom. Upon these proceedings, great numbers transplanted themselves and families into America, and gave birth to a second colony in New-England, that of Massachusetts Bay.

According to Bates and Dugdale, there were eight sail of ships at once in the river of Thames filled with Puritan families leaving England, among whom were the famous Oliver Cromwell, afterwards protector; John Hampden, esq. the celebrated opposer of the ship-money tax; and Mr. Arthur Haselrig: but the ship was stopped by an order of council, and a proclamation issued, prohibiting all masters and owners of ships to carry any passengers to New-England, without a special licence from the privy-council: but the more severely the dissenters were used, the more they increased, both in number and opposition, till the meeting of the Long Parliament in 1640, when the affairs of religion took a new turn.

We must not forget, that in the early part of this king's reign, the controversy about keeping the Sabbath was revived by one Theophilus Bradbone, a minister of Suffolk, who asserted, "That the commandment of sanctifying every seventh day, as in the Mosaical decalogue, is moral and perpetual; and that no kind of work, business, employment, or recreation, even of the most innocent kind, was to be allowed on that day, nor so much as any discourse or mention to be made or held of pleasures, or any worldly matter." This doctrine was strenuously opposed by the High-church party, as tending to gall men's necks with a Jewish yoke, against the liberty of Christians, and giving the emissaries of the church of Rome an handle to pervert people to popery, by persuading them that the protestant religion was so rigorous, that no lawful liberty was allowed therein: and further, it was urged that Christ, as lord of the Sabbath, had mitigated the rigor thereof, and allowed the indulging in decent and lawful recreations; and that this strict observance was set up merely from a principle of dissension, and in order to brand with the character of Libertines all who did not comply therewith. The books written on this subject were all called in; and Bradbone being cited before the High commission-court, thought proper to retract his opinions. Soon after, the king following the example of his father, as related in the civil history of that reign, issued a declaration, allowing his subjects, especially the common people, to have sports on the Lord's day, at such times as they were not exercised in their public devotion at church.

We have in the foregoing part of this history taken notice of the sending over the Liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, to the church of Scotland, and the commotion it occasioned there. Charles about this time thought it necessary, in order to quell the disturbances in that kingdom, to raise an army, to reduce his rebellious subjects to obedience, which gave rise to all the calamities which ensued in church and state, in the few remaining years of this unhappy reign. The liturgy, and shortly after episcopacy itself, were both abrogated by those who usurped the government of the kingdom; and it is with concern we find that many ministers of the gospel here in England, who were reputed learned and pious men, and had conformed to the doctrine and discipline of the church, did, to the great scandal of religion, join with those that opposed the king's just authority, and the laws of their country; and by their preachings and writings excited the people to an unlawful and unnatural war, on pretence of reformation of religion.

The discipline of the church being set aside, no other was created in its room till several years afterwards. In this interval, the clergy were permitted to read more or less of the Liturgy, as they pleased, and to govern their parishes according to their discipline. The vestments were left indifferent. As soon as the presbyterians got the upper hand, they peremptorily refused that indulgence to others which they themselves had so warmly pleaded for during the time of episcopacy: and so rigid were they in point of uniformity, that in the treaty of the Isle of Wight, they would not indulge the king with the liberty of having a Common-prayer book to read privately in his family; and when they had destroyed the hierarchy, and got all the best livings in their own hands, yet they were still dissatisfied, for want of church power to crush the sectaries, as they termed all who dissented from them. Of these the independents were the chief, whose opinion it was, that every congregation had power to chuse and ordain their pastor, and jointly with him to manage their religious concerns, without classical or synodical assemblies, and consequently were for universal toleration. This the presbyterians would by no means allow them: not content with having their form of church government made the natural establishment, they were continually soliciting the parliament for a coercive power, in order to prosecute all those who differed from them in opinion. Upon which the army, which consisted chiefly of independents, by Cromwell's new-modelling of it, and whose favourite point was liberty of conscience, became violently incensed against them, and betook itself to the desperate measures of assuming the sovereign power, bringing the king to justice, setting aside the covenant, and erecting a commonwealth, and at last became so far masters, as to hold the presbyterians in a sort of subjection.

The presbyterians finding the tables thus turned upon them, and that they had no longer any thing more than the shadow of authority in the state, began to think of restoring Charles II. In this sentiment they were greatly confirmed by that prince's declaration from Breda, in which he granted liberty to tender consciences, and promised that no man should be disquieted or called in question for difference of opinion, which did not disturb the peace of the kingdom. Upon this declaration, they heartily joined the episcopalians in effecting the restoration of the royal family, which was accomplished in the year 1660, in the manner related in its place.

With monarchy, the antient church government was also restored, and the presbyterians soon found themselves reduced to the necessity of pleading for that indulgence they had denied to others. After several fruitless tentatives to get themselves admitted to a share of church government and civil employments, without being obliged to submit to those terms of union exacted by our canons, they were finally crushed by the episcopal act of uniformity in the year 1662; by which all who did not conform to the Liturgy by a certain day, were deprived of all ecclesiastical benefits, without the king's having any discretionary power to mitigate the execution of this rigorous law, or any provision being made for the maintenance of the deprived. All who had not episcopal ordination, were made incapable of holding any benefice, and the next year the conventicle act was passed, as was that called the Five Mile Act, in 1665.

After struggling many years under these difficulties, the dissenters had a little respite, by the king's declaration in 1672, for suspending the execution of the penal laws, as well against non-conformists as papists: but this indulgence did not last long; the parliament considering it as an alarming step in favour of popery, annulled this declaration, and passed the famous Test Act; by which it was enacted, that no man should bear any office or place who did not take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and receive the sacrament according to the usage of the church of England. Presbyterianism was now humbled in the dust, and continued to be so all the rest of the reign of Charles II.

The steps taken by James II. to subvert the established religion of this nation, and introduce popery in its stead, have been so fully related in the history of that reign of errors, that it would be equally needless as tedious to recapitulate the particulars here. Suffice it to observe, that the church party, perceiving the king's intentions, and their all was at stake, thought proper to lay their resentment, and join the dissenters in promoting the Revolution; and these latter, being entertained the hopes of coming into power, William indeed exerted his utmost efforts to obtain a comprehension for them, but the the sacramental test; but in this he was vigorously opposed by his parliament, and all that the dissenters could obtain was the Act of Indulgence, whereby they were excused from all penalties for their not coming to church; and for going to separate meetings. This however was a valuable privilege, and to this act they are indebted for that happy liberty of conscience which they enjoy at this day.

The state of learning, arts, and sciences, during the government of the Stuarts, we have occasionally touched upon at the end of each reign; and have also given some account of the most celebrated persons in arts, arms, or literature, who flourished during that period. Little then remains for us to add in this article: we shall therefore, agreeable to our plan, proceed to give an account of the most remarkable statutes (and such only) that were enacted by the several parliaments from the accession of James I. to the Revolution, with the taxes or subsidies granted to them for the support of government; a short sketch of the public revenues before and at the Revolution; and, by way of conclusion, shall add some remarks on the state of commerce during that æra.

THE statutes of the greatest importance that passed in this reign were,

An act, depriving criminals of their clergy, who are guilty of stabbing.

An act, making it felony in a person to marry a second husband or wife, the first being alive, unless when the husband or wife remains seven years beyond sea, or are absent in the king's dominions, the one not knowing the other to be living.

An act, making witchcraft (the notion of which prevailed greatly in those days) felony, without benefit of clergy: and if any person shall take upon them to tell or declare by witchcraft, charm, or sorcery, where any treasure of gold or silver may be found, or goods lost be recovered, they are to suffer one year's imprisonment, and be set in the pillory every three months during that year.

3 Jac. I. An act to prevent dangers which may happen from popish recusants, wherein such persons are disabled to execute any office in the government, and are disabled to sue, &c. as persons excommunicated. A recusant forfeits one hundred pounds who sends his child beyond sea; and such child remaining a recusant after eighteen years of age, is rendered incapable of inheriting or enjoying lands or goods transferred, or descending to him; and the disposal of livings in his gift is given to the universities.

An act for cutting the New River, and bringing its water to London.

7 Jac. I. An act for the founding Chelsea-college, which recites, That whereas his majesty, for the refuting of errors and heresies, had founded a college at Chelsea, and therein placed certain divines, incorporated by the name of The Provost and Fellows of the College of King James in Chelsea, near London: that it should be lawful for the said provost and fellows to cut a trench or channel, for bringing water from the river Lee in Hackney-Marsh to the city of London, for the perpetual maintenance of the said provost and fellows, and their successors, by the rent to be made of the said waters.

21 Jac. I. An act, declaring all unlawful monopolies and dispensations with penal laws void; as also all compositions for the forfeitures on the breach of any penal statute before judgment.

An act, called the Statute of Limitation, whereby actions personal are to be brought within a certain limited time.

An act against prophane swearing and cursing.

An act, making it murder to conceal a dead bastard child.

An act for making the river Thames navigable from Oxford.

T A X E S of J A M E S I.

In the first year of this king, the house of commons granted him for life, a subsidy of tonnage and poundage for the guard of the seas. Tonnage duty was three shillings for every ton of wine, and one shilling for an aum of Rhenish wine. The poundage was one shilling for every twenty shillings value of goods exported and imported, woollen cloths exported excepted; as also fish exported, taken by English subjects.

In his second year he sent privy-seals to the wealthiest of the citizens of London, to borrow money of them; and soon after the customs of merchandizes, both outward and inward, were raised, and let out to farm.

In a parliament holden at Westminster, the third year of his reign, there were given him three entire subsidies, and six fifteenths by the temporality, and by the clergy four entire subsidies.

In his seventh year he had aid throughout England for making his eldest son prince Henry knight, which brought in great sums of money.

In his eighteenth year the temporality gave him two subsidies, and the clergy three; and in the year 1623, the temporality gave him three subsidies and three fifteenths, and the clergy four subsidies. Besides these subsidies, he issued many great privy-seals, and had also a benevolence throughout the realm.

C H A R L E S I.

THE statutes of any moment that passed in this reign, were the following:

1 Car. I. An act forbidding all unlawful sports on Sundays, such as bear and bull-baitings, interludes, common plays, and other pastimes, on pain of three shillings and four-pence, to be paid by the aggressor, or to suffer the punishment of the stocks.

In the statute-book, before the acts made in the third of Charles I. we meet with the petition containing a declaration of the rights and privileges of the people, presented by both houses of parliament

3 Car. I. An act prohibiting the going or sending any person to a popish seminary: it is also enacted, That any one who contributes to the maintenance of any convent or seminary, shall forfeit all his goods and his lands for life, and be disabled to prosecute any suit to receive a gift or legacy, &c. as a person excommunicated; provided that if any one so educated conforms to the church of England within six months after his return, he shall not incur the penalties in this act.

17 Car. I. An act providing, That whereas Michaelmas Term till then began in the octaves of St. Michael, or a week after Michaelmas-day, it should not for the future begin till three weeks after Michaelmas:

An act for making the parliament perpetual, enacting, That the parliament then assembled should not be dissolved, prorogued, or adjourned, but by act of parliament, which contributed as much as any thing to the ruin of king Charles and the constitution; and therefore by the act of the 12 Car. II. which was made in the year 1660, immediately after the restoration, that parliament is declared and enacted to be dissolved and determined.

An act dissolving the court of Star-chamber, and enacting, That a writ of habeas corpus shall be allowed on commitments by the council.

An act repealing the act for establishing the High-commission Court. By the same statute it is enacted, That the ecclesiastical courts shall inflict no penalty on offenders.

An act declaring the tax of ship-money illegal, and abolishing the same, with all the judgments and proceedings consequent thereupon.

An act for restraining the incroachments and oppressions of the stannary courts.

An act ascertaining the metes and bounds of forests, and appointing commissioners to settle the same.

An act for regulating weights and measures, and the office of the clerk of the market; whereby it is enacted, That there shall be but one weight and measure throughout the kingdom; and that whoever uses any other, shall forfeit five shillings for every offence.

Taxes of Charles I.

King James at his death left his son a large dominion but a poor exchequer, which was the occasion that his taxations were more frequent than in his father's reign.

In the first year the parliament, at their first session, granted him two subsidies from protestants and four from popish recusants, and from the clergy three; and till the parliament provided other means, he continued to levy, as in his father's time, tonnage, poundage, and other sums, by way of impost, upon merchandise imported and exported.

In his second year he raised near 200,000*l.* by way of loan, for the war with France, and the relief of Rochelle.

In his third year the parliament gave him five subsidies. In the sixth year he revived an antient custom or usage*, by which all that were qualified by the law for knighthood were to take upon them that order, or to make fine for respite of the same, whereby 100,000*l.* was brought into the Exchequer.

In his ninth year he issued writs, under the great seal of England, for the charging of the ports, towns, cities, boroughs, and counties of this realm respectively, with providing and furnishing ships for the defence of the king and kingdom; whereby great sums were raised. This tax was commonly known by the name of ship-money, and was the principal cause of all the troubles that afterwards befel this unfortunate prince; and ended but with the sacrifice of his life.

In a parliament holden in Ireland the same year, the deputy or lord-lieutenant obtained some subsidies for the payment of the army of that realm; and the over-rate of his majesty's revenue there.

In his sixteenth year the earl of Strafford, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, obtained of the Irish parliament the grant of four subsidies; and the convocation of bishops in England gave him an ample benevolence of four shillings in the pound for six years, to be assessed on all the clergy in England, towards the carrying on of the war then begun with Scotland.

And in the same year the English parliament, then assembled, granted him four entire subsidies for the relief of the army then raised against the Scots, and for relief of the northern parts of the kingdom, then much burthened by an army of Scots quartering in those parts, who imposed great taxes on the inhabitants for their maintenance.

In his seventeenth year the same parliament granted two subsidies for the further relief of his majesty's army, and the northern parts of the kingdom; and likewise a subsidy of tonnage and poundage, and other sums of money payable upon merchandise exported and imported, from the 25th of May to the 15th of July following; and when that act was on the point of expiring, they granted another for the same duties, from the 15th of July, to the 10th of August following; and by five other subsequent acts, the parliament granted the like subsidy and impost upon merchandise to the 3d of May, 1642.

And in the said 17th year several sums of money were by act of parliament charged upon persons according to their ranks, dignities, offices, callings, estates, and quality, by way of poll, for the speedy disbanding two armies then in the bowels of the kingdom.

This year also a contribution, or loan, was granted for the relief of Ireland, where a bloody rebellion had broken forth the preceding year.

And in his 18th year an act passed for raising and levying of monies for the necessary defence, and great affairs of the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and for the payment of debts undertaken by the parliament.

These were all the taxations, either by loan or otherwise, raised by royal authority during this reign: but the war which the parliament raised, without his authority, and against it, was supported and maintained, by prodigious sums of money illegally levied on the subject, by contribution, assessment, and excise, which cannot be properly inserted here; and it is to be wished the memory of such unjust proceedings might be for ever effaced.

* See Coke's second book of Institutes, fol. 593. statute De Militibus.

CHARLES II.

THE statutes of most consequence that passed in this reign were,

An act of the 12th (that is, the first from the Restoration) Car. II. for dissolving the Long Parliament, and making the convention a parliament.

An act for reducing the interest of money from eight to six per cent.

An act appointing the twenty-ninth of May to be publicly kept as a day of thanksgiving.

An act for restoring the clergy to their rights.

An act for the encouragement of navigation, prohibiting the importation of any goods from Asia, Africa, or America, but in English ships; and that no goods shall be imported in English ships, but from the places of their growth or manufacture; and three-fourths of the seamen are to be English.

Ships loading in the plantations to give security to bring their cargoes to England, or to some British plantation, and not to carry them to any foreign country.

No goods of the growth of Muscovy shall be imported but in English ships, navigated as aforesaid.

Nor any goods from the Turkish empire, unless in vessels belonging to the port or place from which such goods come.

No wines of the growth of France or Germany shall be imported in any but in English vessels; and all masts, and other naval stores, raisins, figs, prunes, olive oils, corn, grain, sugar, pot-ashes, brandy, or spirits; wines of the growth of Spain, the Canaries, Portugal, the Madeiras; all goods of the growth of Russia, currants, and Turkish commodities, imported in any English shipping, navigated as above, shall be deemed aliens goods. See an additional act, 15 Car. II. cap. 7. for encouragement of trade.

In this same twelfth year of Charles II. was passed the first legal act for laying an excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors. This act was first set on foot during the protectorship of Cromwell.

An act for taking away court of wards, knights service, &c. and settling a revenue on the crown in lieu thereof.

An act for appointing the thirtieth of January to be observed annually as a fast.

13 Car. II. An act declaring the command of the militia by sea and land to be solely in the king, and that neither both, or either of the houses of parliament, have any pretence to the same, nor can lawfully levy any war, offensive or defensive, against the crown.

An act, containing articles for the better government of the royal navy and ships of war.

An act, restoring ecclesiastical jurisdiction to the bishops and spiritual courts.

An act (called the Corporation Act) for the better governing of corporations, whereby all officers are obliged to declare, "That it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king, &c. to renounce the solemn league and covenant, &c."

14 Car. II. An act, decreeing that quakers, and others, refusing to take an oath before a magistrate when required, or persuading others not to take such oath, and quakers assembling in conventicles, to forfeit five pounds for the first offence, ten pounds for the second, and for the third offence to abjure or quit the realm.

An act to establish the uniformity of public prayer, and the administration of the sacraments, and of consecrating bishops, priests, and deacons, after the manner of the church of England.

An act prohibiting the printing of impious, heretical, seditious, or schismatical books. By this act all books are prohibited to be printed that are not entered in Stationers-Hall, and duly licensed; and the printing-presses are regulated, and three copies are reserved for the king's library, and the two universities.

15 Car. II. An act for the encouragement of trade, navigation, the plantation, and Fisheries. See 12 Car. II. cap. 18.

An act, called the Conventicle Act, of which we have given an account in the history of this reign.

An act condemning seamen who refuse to fight and defend merchant ships against pirates, to lose their pay; and if they do fight, and save the ship, declaring them entitled to be rewarded out of the cargo, and at a rate not exceeding two per cent.

16 Car. II. Persons cheating at play to forfeit treble the value of what they win; and all securities for money won at play, exceeding one hundred pounds at any one time, to be void.

19 Car. II. An act to redress inconveniencies for want of proof of persons deaths beyond seas, or absenting themselves, upon whose lives estates depend.

22 Car. II. An act allowing the exportation of corn, oxen, horses, &c.

22 and 23 Car. II. An act against maiming, &c. commonly called the Coventry Act, making it felony, without benefit of clergy, maliciously to cut out or disable the tongue, put out an eye, slit the nose, cut off the nose or lip, or disable any limb or member of any of his majesty's subjects.

An act against maliciously burning ricks or stacks of corn, hay, &c. killing of cattle, or maiming them, or destroying trees or fences in the night.

An act enacting how intestates estates shall be administered and distributed. By this act, ordinaries, &c. upon granting administrations are required to take bonds, with two sureties for the due administration of the intestate's goods; and the surplusage, after debts and funeral charges paid, shall be distributed in the manner following, viz. one third to the wife of the intestate, and the residue among his children, and such as legally represent them, other than such children (not heirs at law) who shall have any estate by settlement of the intestate in his life-time, equal to the other shares. And where any such children shall have been advanced by settlements or portions not equal to the other shares, he or they shall have so much of the surplusage as shall make the estate of all to be equal; but the heir at law shall have an equal part in the distribution with the other children, without any consideration of what he hath by descent, or otherwise, from the intestate.

If there be no children nor legal representatives of them, one moiety, or half, shall be allotted to the wife, and the residue agreeably to the next of kindred to the intestate, in equal degrees, and to those who represent them.

No representatives to be admitted among collaterals, after brothers and sisters children. If there be no wife, all shall be distributed among the children; and if no child, to the next of kin to the intestate in equal degree, and their representatives. No such distribution shall be made till one year after the intestate's death; and every one who has a share in it shall give bond, with sureties, that if debts afterwards appear, he shall return a rateable part.

An act to regulate the weights and measures of corn and salt.

By an act of the same year, none may keep dogs, nets, guns, or any other engine or instrument for taking or destroying the game, but he who hath lands of inheritance of one hundred pounds per annum, or for life, in his own or his wife's right, or a lease of ninety-nine years of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, unless the heir of an esquire, or other person of higher degree: and persons fishing in any private waters or rivers, shall pay treble damages to the party aggrieved, and a sum not exceeding ten shillings, to the poor. N. B. By this act none are deemed esquires under the degree of knights sons.

29 Car. II. An act to prevent frauds and perjuries, &c. By this act it is declared, That all leases, estates, interests of freehold, or term of years, or any uncertain interests in lands, &c. not put in writing, and signed by the contracting parties, shall have no greater effect than estates at will, except leases not exceeding three years, whereof the rent shall be two-thirds of the value.

No action shall be brought to charge a defendant, upon any promise to answer for the debt or miscarriage of another, or upon any agreement in consideration of marriage, or upon any contract or sale of lands, &c. or any interest concerning them, or on any agreement not to be performed within a year, unless such agreement, or a note thereof, be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, or some other authorized by him.

All devises of lands or tenements shall be in writing, and signed by the testator, or some other, in his presence, and by his direction, and subscribed in his presence by three or four witnesses, or else they shall be void.

No writ of execution shall bind the property of goods but from the time of its delivery to the sheriff.

No contract for the sale of goods, of the value of ten pounds or upwards, shall be good, unless the buyer receive part of them, or give something in earnest, or some note thereof in writing, to be signed by the parties to be charged, or their agents.

No nuncupative (or verbal) will shall be good, where the estate bequeathed exceeds thirty pounds, unless it be proved by three witnesses present at the making thereof, nor unless the testator bid them bear witness that such is his will, nor unless it be made in the last sickness of the deceased, in his dwelling-house, unless he be surprized, and die before his return; and after six months, no testimony shall be received of such nuncupative will, unless the said testimony were put into writing within six days after making such will.

No will in writing of any personal estate shall be repealed by words only, except the same be in the life-time of the testator committed to writing, read to him, appointed by him, and this attested by three witnesses.

An act abolishing the writ De Heretico Comburendo, or for burning heretics; with all proceedings therein, and all punishments by death, in consequence of ecclesiastical censures.

31 Car. II. was passed the famous HABEAS CORPUS act. It is enacted by this statute, That upon the service of the Habeas Corpus on a jailor or his servants, or upon any other person having a prisoner in his custody, the prisoner, within three days after, upon paying or tendering twelve pence per mile for the removal of him, shall be brought up, and the writ returned, and the cause of his imprisonment certified: and officers refusing to make their returns, or bring the prisoner up, &c. as aforesaid, shall forfeit one hundred pounds for the first offence, and two hundred pounds for the second.

If any person committed to prison for treason or felony, expressed in the warrant, shall, the first week of the term or day of the sessions of Oyer and Terminer, pray to be brought to his trial, if he be not indicted the next term of Oyer and Terminer: after such commitment he shall upon motion, the last day of such term or sessions, be admitted to bail.

Prisoners may obtain their Habeas Corpus from any judge, or out of the Chancery: and if the lord-chancellor, keeper, or any other judge, shall deny such Habeas Corpus, he shall forfeit five hundred pounds to the party aggrieved.

We must here repeat an observation we have elsewhere made, that few of our English monarchs ever passed a greater number of acts of parliament for the benefit of the subject than this king.

TAXES OF CHARLES II.

Immediately after his restoration (called the twelfth year of his reign) the parliament presented a bill "for a speedy provision of money to pay off and disband all the forces of this kingdom, both by sea and land. This was to be done by poll, and was a very great tax, because many orders of men were included in it, which had never been mentioned in any former act of the like kind. The reader perhaps will not be displeased to see the assessments of the several degrees, as they are rated in the said act.

"1. Every duke of England, Scotland, and Ireland, inhabiting and residing in this kingdom, was to pay one hundred pounds; every marquis, eighty pounds; every earl, sixty pounds; a viscount, fifty pounds; a baronet, forty pounds; the eldest son of a duke of twenty-one years of age, sixty pounds; of a marquis, fifty pounds; of an earl, forty pounds; of a viscount, thirty-five pounds; of a baron, thirty pounds; a baronet of any of the three kingdoms, or Nova Scotia, thirty pounds; a knight of the Bath, thirty pounds; a knight bachelor, twenty pounds; a serjeant at law, twenty pounds; an esquire, ten pounds; and every widow, according to her husband's degree, a third part what her husband was to pay.

2. "Every parson or vicar possessed of a parsonage or vicarage, or other estate of one hundred pounds, forty shillings; every doctor of the civil or common-law, five pounds; every advocate, five pounds; a judge or commissioner in the Court of Admiralty, twenty pounds; a prætor, five pounds; a doctor of physic, ten pounds.

3. "The lord-mayor of London, forty pounds; every sheriff, alderman, or who hath fined for alderman, twenty pounds; every deputy-alderman, ten pounds; the town-clerk of London, twenty pounds; every common councilman, five pounds; every master of the first twelve companies, ten pounds; every warden thereof, six pounds thirteen shillings and four-pence; every liveryman of those companies, five pounds; every one who had been master of any of the companies of dyers, brewers, leatherfellers, girdlers, stationers, woodmongers, upholsterers, apothecaries, pewterers, tallow-chandlers, armourers, or sadlers, six pounds; every warden of any of those companies, five pounds; every liveryman of them, three pounds; every of the yeomanry, one pound; every master of the company of barber-chirurgeons, white-bakers, wax-chandlers, cutlers, butchers, carpenters, painters, cordwainers, coopers, scriveners, brown-bakers, turners, or innholders, three pounds; every one who had been warden of any of those companies, two pounds; every liveryman thereof, one pound; every person who had been master of the company of founders, cutlers, masons, bricklayers, joiners, plaisterers, weavers, fruiterers, marblers, embroiderers, poulterers, cooks, or plumbers, one pound; every warden of those companies, fifteen shillings; and every one of the livery, ten shillings; every person who hath been of the livery of either company of bowyers, fletchers, blacksmiths, bottle makers, wool-packers, farriers, paviors, loreiners*, glasiors, clerks, or watermen, five shillings; every freeman of any company within the city of London, twelve-pence; every keeper of one or more hackney-coaches and two horses, ten shillings; every merchant-stranger, if a knight, forty pounds; if below that degree, and trading to sea, ten pounds; if trading within the land, five pounds: every alien using trade within any city or corporation, if a house-keeper, ten shillings; every English merchant in or about London, not a freeman, ten pounds; every factor in the city, two pounds; every person that hath been alderman in any city within the kingdom, under the degree of a knight or esquire, five pounds.

4. "The prothonotary of the King's-Bench, one hundred pounds; clerk of the Crown of the same, twenty pounds; Custos Brevium of the same, forty pounds; marshal of the same, fifty shillings; master of the Rolls, sixty pounds; clerk of the Crown in Chancery, forty pounds; clerk of the Rules and in the King's Bench, ten pounds; master of the Subpœna Office, forty pounds; warden of the Fleet, fifty pounds; clerk of the hanaper, fifty pounds; clerk of the Inrolment, each ten pounds; each of the six clerks in Chancery, forty pounds; every curfitor of the same, ten pounds; usher of the same, ten pounds; every clerk of the pettybagg, five pounds; every examiner, ten pounds; chief register of the same, twenty pounds; every under register, ten pounds; every clerk in the office of the Six Clerks in Chancery, eight pounds; each of the clerks of the Chapel of the Rolls, three pounds; every prothonotary of the Common-Pleas, fifty pounds; Custos Brevium of the same, eighty pounds; every philazer of the same, ten pounds; clerk of the Outlawries, twenty pounds; clerk of the Statutes, twenty pounds; clerk of the Treasury, ten pounds; exigenter of London, forty pounds; every other exigenter, five pounds; the king's remembrancer of the Exchequer, forty pounds; every teller of the same court, twenty pounds; the treasurer's remembrancer, ten pounds; every attorney of the office of the king's remembrancer, ten pounds; every attorney of the office of Pleas, ten pounds; the remembrancer of the First-fruits, twenty pounds; clerk of the Estreats, twenty pounds; clerk of the Pleas, thirty pounds; the auditor of the receipts in the Exchequer, forty pounds; clerk of the Pel in the Receipt, thirty pounds; usher of the Court of Exchequer, twenty pounds; every attorney in the Office of Pleas there, ten pounds; every auditor of the same, ten pounds; every clerk of the court of the Duchy of Lancaster, ten pounds; every auditor of the same, ten pounds; every clerk of the Privy-seal, ten pounds; every clerk of the Signet, ten pounds; every attorney in any of the courts at Westminster, or within the courts of Law or Equity, or in the counties palatine of Chester, Lancaster, Durham, and the marches of Wales, three pounds; every person in any office or place under the king (except his household servants in ordinary) ten pounds; the lieutenant of the Tower of London, fifty pounds; every one that could spend in lands, leases, monies, or stock, one hundred pounds per annum, forty shillings; and so for a greater or lesser estate: every single person above the age of sixteen years, twelve-pence; every single person not rated nor receiving alms, above sixteen years of age, six-pence."

In his said first year the parliament also granted him a subsidy on tonnage and poundage, and other sums of money payable upon merchandize exported and imported. The duties of excise on malt liquors, cyder, perry, mead, spirits or strong waters, coffee, tea, sherbet, and chocolate, were also settled on him during life, by way of additional revenue to the tonnage and poundage. This was granted by way of recompensing the crown for the emoluments it lost by the taking away the courts of ward, and liveries and tenures in capite or by knights-service. By this means the royal revenues were raised to twelve hundred thousand pounds per annum, which was more than any king of England ever enjoyed, except Henry VIII.

The following year the commons granted the king a supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds for his present occasions, to be levied by a monthly tax of seventy thousand pounds for eighteen months; a perpetual and annual tax of two shillings on every chimney-hearth in each house, alms-houses excepted, was also laid on by the commons, who at the same time impowered his majesty to levy the seventy thousand pounds per month for three years.

In the year 1663, the commons granted him four entire subsidies; and the clergy in convocation, following their example, did the like. This was the last aid the spirituality gave; for it was resolved on hereafter to tax the church benefits as temporal estates were taxed.

The following year the parliament granted the king a supply of two millions and an half towards the maintenance of a war against the Dutch.

In 1665 the commons voted the king a new supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds to continue the war, and one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to the duke of York, for the great services he had done to the nation; and pursuing this their prodigious liberality, they voted in the following year a further supply of one million eight hundred thousand pounds.

In 1668 they granted the sum of three hundred and ten thousand pounds, by an imposition on wines and other liquors.

For the other taxes imposed in this king's reign, as also for those in the following one of his brother

James II. we refer the reader to the history of those reigns, where he will find them noticed as they occurred.

THERE being but one parliament in this reign, which did not sit much above two months, very few laws were made. The principal of them were,

An act prohibiting the importation of gun-powder, arms, ammunition, or utensils of war, without licence, on pain of forfeiture.

An act appropriating a duty laid upon coals, to the finishing the cathedral of St. Paul's.

An act concerning administrators and intestates personal estate. This enacts, That no administrator shall be cited to render an account of the personal estate of his intestate, otherwise than by inventory thereof, unless at the instance of some person in behalf of a minor, or of one having a demand out of such estate as a creditor, or next of kin.

If after the death of a father any of his children shall die intestate, without wife, or issue, in the life-time of the mother, every brother and sister, and their representatives, shall have an equal share with her.

THE late Mr. Anderson, in his excellent Treatise on the Origin of Commerce*, observes, that the seventeenth century may be truly said, from its very commencement, to approach to a resemblance of modern times, whether considered in a commercial or a political light. Navigation, the arts, mechanical, mathematical, manufactural, and nautical; agriculture, architecture, and plantations, were amazingly improved; almost all the commercial, banking, and metallic companies of Europe, established nearly as at present subsisting; the great and principal increase of the commerce of England and Holland effected, who also got into their hands the trade of the famous Hanse-Towns, now on their decline. Many new inventions and projects were set on foot; the great increase of trade begot the enlargement and embellishment of the city of London and its suburbs. Many excellent new productions were introduced among us, and here naturalized. New English plantations were formed in America, and the old ones greatly improved. In a word, commercial liberty was legally and firmly established in England. In general, it will be seen, that towards the close of this century, commerce gradually advanced to almost its very growth of perfection; and almost every part of Christendom endeavoured to push into trade and manufacture, whilst at the same time England's commerce and shipping continued visibly to prosper and increase.

We shall from the above-named author briefly point out some of the principal steps in this happy progress, at least so far as relates to the period at present under our consideration.

King James I. having, at his accession to the crown of England, called in all his own ships of war, as well as our then numerous privateers, which, though they had greatly annoyed the enemy, had done infinite damage to the commerce of the nation; he thereby put an end to the warlike expeditions he had been engaged in, and declared himself to be at peace with all the world. This pacific disposition in the king, so often (and in great measure with justice) termed pusillanimous, did however give a breathing-time to our mercantile and colonising adventurers to plant, and gradually improve the colonies of Virginia, New-England, Bermudas, and Newfoundland; as also to make a considerable progress in the East India trade. At the opening of his first parliament, James spoke strongly against monopolies, but he afterwards gave great encouragement to them. Our own woollen manufacture being now become so very considerable, and so much of it sent abroad as to work up all, or near all, our own wool at home, it was thought high time to prohibit the exportation of it, which James did by proclamation in the year 1604, the second of his reign.

By a statute of this same year, when wheat is not above one pound six shillings and eight pence per quarter; rye, pease, and beans, fifteen shillings; and barley and meal fourteen shillings per quarter; they may be exported in English ships, paying custom, two shillings per quarter for wheat, and one shilling and four-pence for the other kinds.

The English East-India company sent out their second voyage thither in the same year 1604, with four ships under sir Henry Middleton; two of which he loaded with pepper at Bantam, and sent the other two to the isles of Banda, famous for the trade of nutmegs and mace. At Antigua he laded a good quantity of cloves, with which that place abounded, and returned in 1606, having the misfortune to lose one of his ships at sea. In the year 1605, the present Levant, or Fishery Company, was erected, by the designation of The Merchants of England trading to the Levant Seas. Thus a most profitable trade to England was established in perpetuity, whereby great quantities of our woollen manufactures, and of later times much other merchandize, as watches, jewels, &c. have been annually exported thither: besides, the immense quantities of raw silks brought from thence, have been the means of raising our silk manufacture to its present height, and of greatly advancing many other sorts of manufactures.

In the year 1607, James granted an exclusive charter or licence to Richard Pinkwell, esq. and his colleagues, for the sole discovery of a north-west passage to China, Cathay, the Moluccas, and other parts of the East-Indies, incorporating them by the peculiar name of The Colleagues of the Fellowship for the Discovery of the North-West Passage: but this, like most of the former attempts of this kind, came to nothing. Captain Henry Hudson, however, sailed this same year as far north as eighty degrees and a half in quest of the said passage; and he made the like attempt the following year, 1608, to as little purpose, after having in vain tried a north-east passage by Nova Zembla. The same year, however, he discovered and gave his name to the vast bay called, after him, Hudson's Bay.

The English East-India Company now sent out their third voyage with three ships thither: it would however afford the reader as little instruction as pleasure, to relate particulars that are to be found in so many works. It will therefore be sufficient to observe, that the superior industry of the Dutch in India had already been beforehand with us in the spice islands, of which they soon after this made themselves sovereigns, and such remain to this day.

The manufacture of allum was this year, 1608, first invented, and successfully practised in England, being encouraged and carried on in Yorkshire by the lord Sheffield, sir John Bouchier, and other landed gentlemen of that county, to the very great benefit of this nation in general, and to the singular emolument of the proprietors thereof, to this present time.

King James endeavoured to effect the propagation of silk in England, and for that purpose enjoined and encouraged the planters of mulberry-trees; but experience has shewn that silk is not to be propagated in any degree north of the river Loire, in the south of France.

In 1609 the English East-India Company made their fifth voyage thither, but with one ship only, which they sent to Bantam, and thence to the isles of Banda, &c. but the Hollanders being absolute lords there, refused them admittance to traffic. Although the fifteen years exclusive trade granted by queen Elizabeth's charter to the East-India Company, was not to expire till 1615, yet king James, on the thirty-first of May, in the year 1610, was prevailed on to grant the company a renewal of their charter, and to render the company perpetual, with the usual power of making by-laws, of having a common seal, and the other powers in the former charter. The merchants engaged in this trade were so encouraged by this grant, that they now built the largest merchant ship that England ever had, being upwards of one thousand tons burthen, named The Trade's Increase, and with three others made their sixth voyage to India. The king also at this time built the finest ship that had been ever constructed in this country: she was of the burden of one thousand four hundred tons, carried sixty-four cannons, and was named The Prince. By these gradual steps did the Navy-Royal of England arrive at its present magnitude and grandeur.

In this same year, 1610, the spirit of adventuring on new plantations still prevailing, king James made a grant to a certain number of merchants of Bristol, of part of Newfoundland, lying between Cape Bonavista and Cape St. Mary's; and a colony was accordingly sent thither: but they have never been able to this day to make a more cultivable and useful plantation there than is necessary for the famous fishery on its banks, its situation in respect to our continent colonies, and to the French North-American dominions, and for shelter and relief of our own shipping. About this time the London adventurers to Virginia were made a corporation; and the next year the Russian Company for the first time sent two ships to Greenland, for the killing of whales, carrying with them six Biscayners expert in that fishery; but they lost both their ships.

In the year 1612, the cluster of small and very rocky islands, situate between Europe and America, named the Bermuda's, or Somers's Isles, in thirty-two degrees and an half north latitude, five hundred miles east from Carolina, was first planted by the English. They had been discovered almost an hundred years before, by one Bermuda, a Spaniard, but were never planted by any before this time. Sir George Somers and sir Thomas Yates, in their voyage to Virginia, anno 1609, were shipwrecked there, and lived nine months on these islands; in which time they built a ship of the cedar-wood growing there, and sailed in her to Virginia, leaving two men behind them in the largest of the islands, who were found alive in 1612, when the colony was first planted. From sir George Somers, these islands got the name of Somers's Isles, now corrupted to Summer Islands, though the just name of Bermudas is mostly used. Sir George Somers was, it seems, a second time drove on those islands, and died there; but those who were with him, on their arrival in England, made so favourable a report of the beauty and fertility of them, that the Virginia Company, who, as first discoverers, claimed the property, told them to about one hundred and twenty persons, to whom king James granted a charter; and in 1612 they planted, with one hundred and sixty persons, one of the largest of them, them, named St. George's Isle, and sent afterwards five hundred people more thither anno 1619; whereupon they instituted an assembly, with a governor and council. Some have reckoned these islands four hundred in number, but most of them too small to have any name, they being all circumscribed within the compass of little more than forty-seven leagues. St. George's, the largest, is naturally fortified almost quite round with rocks; and where there is any landing-place, they have forts and batteries; and the harbour, there being only one, extremely well fortified. These islands produce very few staple commodities fit for exportation, excepting their cedar sloop, with which they trade, and sell them at the West Indies, and some provisions; with the gain of which trade they are enabled to pay England for all the necessities they are constantly supplied with. This colony was afterwards, like Virginia, made a regal government, and so it still continues. The Bermudians have two misfortunes attending them; a want of fresh water, and frequent attacks of furious winds, thunder, lightnings, &c. At their principal island of St. George, large ships may safely enter and be secure, under shelter of the fortifications, from any attacks of an enemy; and this is probably the reason why we still keep those otherwise unprofitable islands, there being no productions there but what may be had in our other plantations. They grow some tobacco, but it is not equal in goodness to that of Virginia*.

In the year 1613, the English Russia Company procured an exclusive charter for their whale-fishery; and they obliged certain French ships which they had permitted to fish there, to pay them a tribute of eight whales. In the same year captain Saris, in our East-India Company's service, arrived the first of any of our nation at the port of Firando, in the isle of Bungo or Ximo, a part of the empire of Japan. Our Company continued some years to trade there, but were afterwards excluded all resort thither, with all other Europeans, the Dutch only excepted.

Edward Misselden, esq. an eminent merchant, in his treatise, entitled The Circle of Commerce, gives us the following state of the exports and imports of all England in this year 1613.

1. Exported to all the world between Christmas 1612, and Christmas 1613, to the value of	l.	s.	d.
	2,090,640	11	8
2. The customs on these goods	86,794	16	2
3. Impost paid outwards on woollen goods, tin, lead, and pewter	10,000	0	0
4. The merchants gains, freight, and other petty charges	300,000	0	0
Total exports	l. 2,487,435	7	10
Imported during that time in silks, Venice gold and silver stuffs, Spanish wines, linen, and other merchandize, with all the customs thereon	2,141,151	10	0
Balance gained this year to the nation	346,283	17	10

On which Mr. Anderson very pertinently and justly observes, that tho' this balance seems larger than that exhibited under the year 1354 (the twenty-eighth of Edward III.) yet the silver money of that balance being thrice the weight or quantity of our's, amounted to no less than 765,644 l. 1s. of our money: and he remarks further, that the total of the imports then was not one-seventh part of the exports.

The ingenious gentleman first mentioned has likewise given us the total amount of the customs of England for this year 1613, viz.

At the port of London—outwards,	61,322	16	7
inwards,	48,250	1	9
Total custom of the port of London	109,572	18	4
At all the out-ports	outw. 25,471	19	7
	inw. 13,030	9	9
Total account of the customs of Engl.	148,075	7	8

By this account it appears that London, in 1613, paid then very near thrice as much for customs as all the rest of England together.

The year 1614 produced the discovery of a new species of woollen manufacture in England, namely, the making of mixtures dyed in the wool. This has ever since got the appellation of Medley Cloth, all woollen cloth before this time being only of one single colour dyed in the cloth.

In this year also the fine island of Barbadoes in the West-Indies is said to have been discovered and settled on by some English people. It is the mother of all our West-India sugar-islands, and the chief of the Caribbees. It has proved of the greatest advantage to this nation, by its excellent productions. The East India Company now began to trade on the joint stock account, no voyages being from henceforth allowed on separate stocks. The following is a list of the English company's factories at the time we are now speaking of in India, viz. Bantam, Jacatra (since called Batavia), Surat, Amadavar, Agra, Asmere, Bram-pore, Calcutta (from whence the cloth called Calico took its name) Masulipatam, Siam, Benjar, Soccardania, Macassar, Acheen, Jambi, Tecoo, Bandar, and at Firando in Japan: from many of which places our Company have withdrawn their factories, and from some others the Dutch have not long since wormed us out. In the year 1616, one Le Maire, a merchant of Amsterdam, discovered a passage to India by the south-west round Cape Horn, through a new streight south of the Magellanic Streights, to which he gave his name, which it still retains: it is much safer of navigation than the other. About this time one of our ships sailed to Mocha in the Red Sea, and settled a factory there for the first time, by the permission of the Turkish aga.

In the following year we find, for the first time, mention of fins of whales being brought home with the blubber of oil; but the very next year our English adventurers having met with great losses and discouragements, relinquished that fishery; and so it remained till the reign of Charles II. King James now granted new charters of powers to the East-India Company.

* Anderson, vol. I. p. 486, 487.

The colony of Virginia went on increasing, and had by this time considerable quantities of tobacco planted there, which now began to be well taken off at home. Sir Samuel Argall, the then governor, finding this colony in a thriving way, began to have his eye on the French, who had crossed the river St. Lawrence, and had a settlement in the colony then named Acadia (a part of that province called Nova Scotia) and also farther southward, a part of what is now called New England. But he drove the French from Port-Royal, since named Annapolis-Royal; some of whom went home to France, and others of them sailing up the river St. Lawrence, settled in Canada. "We are here to observe (says Mr. Anderson *) that the English, from their very first settling on the continent of America, had ever deemed Nova Scotia to be a part of North-Virginia; for at this time all the country north of Cape Henry was known by the sole name of Virginia, which, being the mother English colony on that continent, and its patent extending to the northernmost parts in America; all the country north of what was at this time planted in Virginia, had the appellation of North-Virginia." It is a justice due to the managers of the Virginia Company to observe, that even so early as the year 1618, they had formed a design to erect a college, for the conversion of the Indians to Christianity, altho' it proved afterwards abortive. In this same year, 1618, the first English African Company was erected by charter, but soon after dissolved, on not answering the expectations either of the adventurers or of the government.

In the year 1620, the English Company trading to the East-Indies obtained leave of the king of Golconda to settle at Madras-Patan, on the coast of Coromandel, where they were permitted to build the fort called St. George; which place has ever since been the Company's general factory for their trade in that country.

In the same year our people first planted the country since called New-England. Captain John Smith having surveyed the inland country, and presented a map of it to Charles prince of Wales, (afterwards king Charles I.) that prince gave it the name of New-England, which was afterwards further peopled, and considerably improved by the emigration of numbers of puritans from the mother-country, on account of the persecution raised against them here for their religious tenets. The colony is at this day the noblest of all our North-American continent provinces: they take off from Great-Britain to the value of three hundred thousand pounds and upwards annually, in British products and manufactures.

According to Mr. Miffelden, in his Circle of Commerce, p. 121. the general balance of our foreign trade for the year 1622, was as follows:

The total amount of exportations	2,320,436	12	10
The total imports	2,619,315	0	0
Balance lost to England this year	298,878	7	2
by her foreign commerce

The same accurate author gives us the total amount of the customs of England, both outward and inward, for the said year 1622, viz. 168,222 l. 15 s. 11 d.

In this same year, 1662, sir William Alexander, afterwards earl of Sterling, having obtained a patent some time before from king James, as king of Scotland, for settling that country called by him Nova Scotia; and having got sundry noblemen and gentlemen of Scotland to be sharers with him in it, sent a colony of Scots thither, who named the peninsula on the east side of the Bay of Fundy, Nova Caledonia, and the other part on the north side Nova Alexandria †: and for the better enabling him to settle that plantation, king James granted him a Scots patent for advancing a number of persons to the hereditary dignity of baronets of Nova Scotia: yet, after considerable pains, and labour and expence, this colony came to nothing.

As the making of rivers navigable is of great benefit to commerce, we cannot pass by unnoticed, an act of parliament passed in the twenty-first year of king James I's reign (1624) for making the river Thames navigable for barges, lighters, and boats; from London to Oxford.

In the year 1625, the first of Charles I. we find a navy-board for England appointed to be managed by twelve commissioners. These seem to have been mostly stationed as at present, into distinct branches, such as a comptroller, a surveyor, a clerk of the navy, &c. This board also, as at present, was to be subordinate to the lord high-admiral, or the admiralty-board, from whom the said commissioners were to receive directions and orders of maritime affairs ‡.

In the same year the Virginia Company was dissolved, and that valuable colony settled as at present, under regal government. It will not be amiss to insert here the state of our Newfoundland fishery, as it stood about this time. It appears then that the ports of Devonshire annually employed one hundred and fifty ships, and carried their fish to Spain and Italy. This fishery maintained eight thousand persons for six months in Newfoundland, and supported many thousands of families at home in preparing nets, casks, provisions, &c. and repairing the ships for the voyage §.

About this time also the sugar-trade of England had its rise in the first settlement of the island of Barbadoes, the mother of all the sugar colonies, which was discovered by sir William Courteen, some time before the death of James I. In the year 1627, king Charles granted Barbadoes and the other Caribbee isles to James Ley, earl of Marlborough, and lord-treasurer; but at the restoration of king Charles II. it was determined by the king and council, that out of the revenue of Barbadoes, then greatly improved, three hundred pounds a year for his life should be granted to the earl of Marlborough, who had disposed of his patent for that sum to the earl of Carlisle; and that the earl of Kinnoul, who claimed under the earl of Carlisle, should be paid one thousand pounds on surrendering lord Carlisle's Charter: and thus Barbadoes and all the other Caribbee isles came under the immediate government of the Crown, and so have remained ever since.

In year 1628, sir David Kirk and his associates possessed themselves of Canada, which then only consisted of the country on the north side of the great river of St. Lawrence, together with the castle of Quebec, of which the said sir David's son was appointed governor. The French hereupon agreed to recognize our king's property in all Nova Scotia, and to pay sir David Kirk fifty thousand pounds for his quitting the forts which he had possessed himself of in Canada; which sum however was never paid.

King Charles I. in the fourth year of his reign, incorporated that best planted, and most populous province of New-England, called the Massachusetts Bay, of which Boston is the capital town. In this same year Carolana, now called Carolina, was first planted by sir Robert Heath, the king's attorney-general, in virtue of a patent granted by Charles to him and his heirs for that purpose. Sir Robert afterwards conveyed this province to the earl of Arundel, who was at the expence of planting sundry parts of it; but the subsequent civil war in England prevented that nobleman's farther progress therein. The Five Nations of the Indian Iroquois, so long the voluntary vassals of the English crown, made a surrender and sale of all their conquests in that country, which reached as far as the Mississippi, to the governor of New-York, in king James II's reign*. The Isle of Providence, the chief of all the Bahama Isles, was also first planted by the English in this year, who likewise claimed the rest of those islands as the first occupiers.

In the Fœdera (vol. xix. fol. 335.) we find a proclamation of king Charles relating to the trade of the East-India Company, in which is the following catalogue of the wares and merchandizes licensed to be exported to India, and to be imported from thence, viz.

Goods allowed to be exported to India, perpetuana's and drapery, pewter, saffron, woollen stockings, silk stockings and garters, ribband roses edged with gold lace, beaver-hats with gold and silver bands, felt hats, strong waters, knives, Spanish leather shoes, iron, and looking-glasses.

Goods which might be imported from India; long pepper, white pepper, white powder, sugar, preserved nutmegs and ginger, preserved mirabolans, bezoar stones, drugs of all sorts, agate heads, blood stones, musk, aloes succotrina, ambergris, rich Persian carpets, quilts of satin, taffaty, painted calicoes, damasks, satins and taffaties of China, quilts of China embroidered with gold, sugar-canes, china dishes and puslanes (that is, porcelane) of all sorts.

By this catalogue (greatly differing from our modern India cargoes) we may learn, says Mr. Anderson, that many rich and useful commodities were then imported from India, and that china-ware or porcelain was come into use in Europe, altho' this is the first authentic mention thereof we meet with; but neither tea nor coffee were as yet brought home by our India ships. The East-India Company, however, seem as yet to have made but very little profit to their adventurers there, whose gains amounting in fifteen years time to no more than twelve and a half per cent.

The year 1632 gave birth to the fine and now prosperous colony of Maryland, being a part of what was then reckoned Virginia. Sir George Calvert, secretary to king James I. first discovered this tract of land; and finding its commodiousness for trade, obtained a promise of the king's grant of the said unplanted country; but he dying before the grant was made out, his son Cæcilius, created lord Baltimore in Ireland, took it out in his own name on the twentieth of June, 1632. The isle of Montserrat, in the West-Indies, was also planted by the English this year, who likewise settled on the isle of Antigua, but soon abandoned it, on account of its having no fresh-water brooks, or scarce any other but rain water.

In the year 1637, king Charles erected a separate East-India Company for a trade to China and Japan. The scheme of this new East-India Company was, as Mr. Anderson very justly observes, an iniquitous one against the old Company, whose charter was, doubtless, entirely exclusive of all others, and the king was probably put upon it by his ministers, on the plausible pretext of great profit to himself.

Towards the close of the year 1642, the war between king Charles and his parliament commenced, to the no small interruption of commerce and manufactures: the trade of the English East-India Company in particular seems to have been at this time almost quite sunk, or at least greatly decayed. The Dutch East-India Company, however, abandoning the settlement they had on the island of St. Helena, in 1651, our Company took possession of that isle. It is situated in the Atlantic Ocean: it consists of one steep and lofty rock, resembling a castle, in the sea, and accessible only in one place, defended now by a platform of forty guns, beyond which is a fort where the governor resides. This island is twenty-seven miles in circuit, and the rock has only a foot of vegetable soil, producing grapes, fruits, and garden-stuffs of all kinds, but no corn comes to perfection. The East India ships always touch here on their return home.

In the year 1652, one Mr. Edwards, an English Turkey merchant, brought home with him a Greek servant, who first introduced the roasting and making of coffee, till then unknown in England. This servant was the first who sold coffee, and kept a house for that purpose in Holland.

Cromwell, in 1654, concluded a treaty of peace and alliance with John IV. king of Portugal, wherein were sundry articles advantageous to the trade of England, both with respect to our subjects freely trading to Brasil, &c. much more than since; as also for the security of the goods of the English dying in Portugal. These articles were in part confirmed by subsequent and more legal treaties.

In the following year, 1655, Cromwell dissolved the East-India company, and laid that trade open for three years; but the infinite damage accruing to our commerce from that step, obliged the protector to reinstate the Company at the expiration of that time. Having nothing further to add of the times preceding the restoration of Charles II. we must do the Rump Parliament and Cromwell, with all their faults, the justice to remark, that they made sundry and very good regulations and laws for the improvement of our commerce and shipping, most of which were adopted, and legally enacted by the parliament, immediately after the constitution reverted to its true form of government.

* See Cox's Description of Carolina, p. 109, 113, 116, &c.

The first matter relating to the subject of commerce after the return of Charles II. to the throne of his ancestors, is the famous act (of navigation so called) passed for the encouragement and increase of shipping and navigation, "wherein (saith the preamble to that act) under the good providence and protection of God, the wealth, safety, and strength of this kingdom, are so much concerned." Having already given the principal enacting clauses of this statute, whereby not only the trade to and from our American plantations was secured to ourselves alone, but likewise our mercantile shipping was considerably increased, as also the number of our sailors, and all trades depending on sea affairs, we shall not enlarge any farther thereupon, but only observe, that by the means of this act, the most important in commerce that ever was enacted in this or any other nation, we are at length become, in great measure, what the Dutch once were, the great carriers of Europe, especially within the Mediterranean sea.

In this same year, 1660 (the twelfth of Charles II's reign, reckoning from his father's murder and the first of his own restoration) sir Thomas Modyford, an eminent planter in the island of Barbadoes, having acquired a prodigious fortune there, chose to remove and settle in Jamaica, where he instructed the young English planters who went over in Cromwell's time, to cultivate the sugar canes; for which, and his other improvements, he was afterwards appointed governor of that island. We must not forget, that in this year an act of parliament passed in favour of the Dutch or Flemings at Colchester in Essex, who had first brought into England the manufacture of baize.

After the restoration of king Charles II. the English East India Company being supposed, notwithstanding the disorders in it of late years, still to exist as established by queen Elizabeth, king James I. and king Charles I. obtained of his majesty a new exclusive charter, dated the third of April, 1661, by the old name of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East-Indies.

About this time the worsted manufacture established in Norwich and Norfolk was prodigiously increased, and the silk manufacture in London had made vast progress, insomuch as to employ above forty thousand men, women and children. After this time we find divers acts of parliament, in this and succeeding reigns, for regulating the silk manufacture at home, and the importation of raw and thrown silk from foreign parts. At this time Charles II. shamefully delivered up to France the country of Nova Scotia, and such part of Canada as was held by our people.

The town, port, and island of Bombay, being part of the portion which Charles had with his wife the princess Catherine, daughter to Alphonso VI. king of Portugal, in 1661, was by him granted, in 1688, in full property for ever to our East-India Company, to hold it in free common soccage of his imperial crown, under an annual rent of ten pounds in gold, to be paid on September 30 yearly at the custom-house in London. It has been since greatly improved both in strength and commerce.

In the year 1662 the English, from their colonies on the north continent of America, first began to cut down the logwood-trees, growing in infinite quantities on the uninhabited coasts of the province of Yucatan, and more especially in the Bay of Cam-peachy, where they first made a settlement for that end, as it was not near any Spanish settlement or inhabitants. In process of time, however, the Spaniards became so uneasy at that settlement, and our logwood-cutting, that they actually made prize of all English vessels they met with in the American seas which had logwood in them. This gave rise to many warm disputes between that nation and us, and it is to be feared will still occasion much altercation.

Connecticut in New-England, and Carolina, were about this time first made royal colonies.

By a report of sir Charles D'Avenant, inspector-general of the customs in the reigns of king William and queen Anne, it appears that our imports in the year 1662 amounted to 4,016,019 l. and our exports to 2,022,812 l. consequently the balance against us was no less than 1,993,207 l.

In 1664 king Charles, on making war with the Dutch, undertook to drive that people out of New-Nedderland (since named New-York) where, as also in the country since called New-Jersey (by the Dutch Nova Belgia) they had got footing, and greatly improved.

In the year 1666 the island of Antigua (or Antego) was finally settled by the English, who had deserted it after a former attempt in 1632. This is now the best English colony of the Caribbees, after Barbadoes and St. Christophers. It is noted for the best harbours in all these islands: it is much troubled with hurricanes, which do great damage both on shore and at sea. It is now well fortified; and by means of tanks or cisterns, they make a tolerable shift to supply themselves with rain water, when their wells fail. They raise and send home to Britain great quantities of sugar, rum, and molasses. In the said year, 1666, captain Sayle, of the new colony of Carolina, being driven in a storm on the Isle of Providence, the chief of the Bahama Isles, on his return to England made a report of the condition of those isles; on which Charles II. granted patent to the lords proprietors of Carolina of the said isles. The island of Providence lies on the east side of the Gulph of Florida, and two hundred and six miles from the continent of that name, in twenty-five degrees fifteen minutes north latitude, and is about twenty-eight miles in length, and eleven in breadth. It came in time to be neglected, and was the resort only of pirates till the reign of king George I. when captain Woodes Rogers was sent regal governor there, to whom the pirates for the most part submitted, and accepted of the king's pardon: it has ever since remained a regal colony. In 1745 two well-designed forts were erected there, so that the island is now in a good posture of defence against an enemy. Besides this principal island of Providence, there are several British settlements on Harbour Island and Eleuthera. The Bahama Islands abound with many sorts of good, and some very uncommon timber, and with plenty of stones and loam. On Exuma there is excellent salt, and they have made some trials to rear sugar-canes. About this time the dying and dressing of fine white woollen cloths, which had long been unsuccessfully attempted, was at length brought to perfection in England.

The general balance of trade of England for the year 1668 was most grievously to our loss; for the imports exceeded the exports 2,132,864 l. 18 s. "This great national loss, says an ingenious author, in his treatise called the British Merchant, was owing to our having a full or uncircumscribed trade with France; which trade being afterwards prohibited, the general balance in 1699 was got to be so far in our favour as 1,147,660 l. 10 s. 9 d. Total gained by us from having no trade with France, 3,280,525 l. 8 s. 9 d. which balance in the year 1703, was so considerably increased, as to be no less than 2,117,523 l. 3 s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. being a gain from the year 1668 of 4,250,388 l. 1 s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

In the year 1670, the wear of muslins was first introduced from India; before which time we made use of the more substantial cambricks, Silesia lawns, and such kind of fine flaxen linen from Flanders and Germany, in return for our woollen manufactures of various kinds exported to those countries in very considerable quantities.

In the same year was made the famous treaty of peace between England and Spain, commonly called the American Treaty; by which Charles II. of Spain recognized all our rights to the American dominions we were possessed of at that time. This year also the Hudson's-Bay Company was established by charter, dated the second of May 1670. This company have three or four forts in different parts of Hudson's-Bay, in which they have in all about one hundred and twenty persons, who for nine months in the year live in a manner shut up within these forts in low houses, so built as to defend them from the piercing cold, snow, and rains. Three or four ships are annually sent from England, laden with coarse woollen goods, guns, powder and shot, spirits, edge tools, and sundry other utensils. In return for which, the natives sell them all kinds of furs, goose quills, castor, whale fins and oil, bed feathers, &c. and they make a handsome annual dividend to their proprietors.

It was in or about the year 1676 that the printing of callicoes was first set on foot in London. At the same time was also brought into use from Holland the weavers loom engine, then called the Dutch loom engine.

Mr. Anderson tells us, that in a manuscript account of Newfoundland in his possession, written anno 1677, it appears, that in the year 1676 there went thither from England one hundred and two ships for the cod-fishery there, each ship having twenty guns, and carrying eighteen boats, and for each boat five men; in the whole one hundred and eighty men. The total value of the fish and oil they made there in that year was computed at 386,400 l. a clear proof how great a nursery this fishery must be for English sailors, and how beneficial for the employment of ship-building, &c.

The year 1680 gave rise to the noble English colony of Pennsylvania in North-America, between forty and forty-three degrees north latitude. Mr. William Penn, an eminent quaker, had it granted him at this time, having purposed to make it a retreat for the people of his persuasion, who were disturbed here on account of their religious tenets. He carried over a great number of these people with him, who were soon afterwards joined by many more from Great Britain and Ireland. At his first arrival in the country he found many English families there, and a considerable number of Dutch and Swedes, who all readily submitted to his wise and excellent regulations, which, with his gentle and generous conduct, soon endeared him to the planters, and so widely spread his fame, and that of his infant government, that numbers flocked over from all parts of Europe to settle in Pennsylvania, for so he called this colony, after his own name. Mr. Penn's beautiful and superb plan of his capital city of Philadelphia, still strictly adhered to, and drawing constantly nearer to perfection, may serve for a pattern to the richest country on earth. At that city they build and employ many good ships: those of five hundred tons and upwards may lie close to the quay. They trade to our sugar colonies with their corn, pease, flour, biscuit, beef, pork, fish, pipe-staves, peltry or furs, lumber, horses, &c. in exchange for sugar, rum, molasses, ginger, pimento, and foreign silver, as dollars, &c. They also employ themselves in raising hemp, flax, and other materials for our British manufactures, as drugs for dyers, &c. iron, and copper; they even carry their corn, fish, pipe-staves, &c. as far as Italy; and going from thence to Britain, they here load woollen, silk, linen, and sundry other necessaries wanted in their colony. They also carry on a clandestine trade with the Spanish main for silver, and their logwood trade, which they import into England, helps to pay for the commodities they carry away from hence*. Thus has the spirit of intolerance and persecution, the most absurd of all political measures, given existence to the finest province of British America.

The Turkey Company was now in a flourishing condition; they exported great quantities of woollen manufactures, and other English wares, to the great enriching this nation. In or about the year 1681, they exported to the value of half a million sterling yearly; in return for which they brought home raw silks, grogram, yarns, galls, drugs, cotton, &c. all which being manufactured in England, afford bread to the poor of the kingdom.

In the year 1682, our East India Company lost Bantam, one of the best factories they had ever possessed in India, occasioned by a quarrel between the old king of Bantam and his son. Our Company sided with the father; the Dutch assisted the son, whose arms prevailing, the old king was made prisoner, and shut up the rest of his days; and the young king gave his friends the Dutch the possession of the castle of Bantam, who soon drove out the English Company's factors and servants, and have ever since remained in possession of the place. Our Company however got possession this same year of Bencoolen, in the great island of Sumatra; by which important settlement they have preserved to England the pepper trade, which otherwise would have been lost to us by their expulsion from Bantam.

The year 1685, the first of king James II. was distinguished by the famous revocation of what was before deemed the perpetual and irrevocable edict of Nantes; by which edict the protestants in France enjoyed the free and public toleration and exercise of their religion in France. This revolution, tho' infinitely distressful to many thousands of individuals in that kingdom, was productive of much good to almost all the protestant countries of Europe, but more especially to this nation. That part of the suburbs of London called Spitalfields, was peopled entirely with French manufacturers in silk; some thousands of other artists helped to people and increase the suburbs of Soho and St. Giles's; others of them brought over the art of making chrystal in perfection, which was thereby lost for a time in France. Above fifty thousand of these refugees settled here, and have proved a great and manifest advantage to us, by improving our arts and manufactures, and likewise by introducing fundry new ones; and supposing, at the lowest computation, that these fifty thousand people, one with another, coming into Great Britain, brought sixty pounds each only in money and effects, they must have brought three millions sterling to the wealth of this nation.

In this same year king James granted the East-India Company a new charter, being their sixth since the Restoration; wherein he prohibits any of his subjects to send out ships, or trade within the limits of the said Company, as had been done by several adventurers, to the Company's great damage, and destruction of that trade. He certifies all the preceding charters in their favour for ever, and in their fullest extent; he invests them with the power of exercising martial law, to extend as far as the island of St. Helena, and to their fort of Peyanian, on the west coast of Sumatra, as well as to their other limits. He also grants full power to the Company to appoint admirals, vice-admirals, and other sea officers; and to raise and muster seamen and soldiers, and to equip their ships in a warlike manner, for attack and defence against any enemy, or any ships carrying on an illicit trade within their limits. The Company may also coin money in any of their forts, of the specie usually coined by the princes of those countries only, which money shall be current every-where within the Company's limits, &c. &c. *

Having thus gone through the most material transactions relating to commerce during this period, I shall close this article with a short view of the gradual increase of our wealth, trade, shipping, and revenue, during this period, extracted from the most approved writers on this subject.

We have an eminent instance of the great increase of our commerce and shipping in only twenty-two years space, from Dr. D'Avenant's discoveries on the public revenues and trade of England; and from Comber's History of English naval affairs, we find that the tonnage of the merchant ships in England at the Revolution (anno 1688) was near double to the tonnage in 1666.

Also that the tonnage of the navy-royal, which in the year 1660, the first of the Restoration, was only 62,594 tons, was in this year, 1688, increased to 101,032 tons.

D'Avenant, who, as inspector-general of the customs, must have been perfectly master of this subject, informs us, that "in the year 1666 the farm of the custom of England was but 390 000 l. yearly; yet from Michaelmas 1671, to Michaelmas 1688, being seventeen years, the customs yielded net to the Crown 9,447,799 l. which at a medium was 555,752 l. per annum."

The last quoted author gives us also a view of the gradual increase of the general rental of England, occasioned by the increase of our commerce, and the great improvements made in agriculture.

"The general rental of England, says he, for land, houses, or mines, about the year 1600, did not exceed six millions per annum; which general rental, soon after the Revolution, was reckoned at about fourteen millions. The above six millions, in 1600, at twelve years purchase (the common price of lands at that period) was worth but seventy-two millions; but the lands, &c. of England, at the rental of fourteen millions, and worth eighteen years purchase, in 1688, amounted to two hundred and fifty two millions." How amazing an alteration in the space of less than one century!
